

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE

TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

IN issuing the present edition of his Dictionary, it is but necessary for the author to repeat what he stated in the preface to the sixth edition, in regard to the cares bestowed by him on its revision and improvement, and the great objects which he has always kept in view. That edition—as the author remarked—comprised nearly two thousand five hundred subjects and terms not contained in the one immediately preceding, many of which had been introduced into medical terminology in consequence of the progress of the science, and others had escaped him in previous revisions.

That the author has not suffered his exertions to flag in the preparation of the present edition is sufficiently manifested by the fact, that he has added between six and seven thousand terms, which are not to be found in the previous editions. To accommodate these, not only has the size of the page been increased, but the whole work has been enlarged by more than one hundred pages. These additions have necessarily required a vast amount of labour, which has been cheerfully bestowed, in order that the work might be made still more worthy of the great favour which it has experienced. It has ever been the anxious wish of the author, to render it “a satisfactory and desirable—if not indispensable—Lexicon, in which the student may search without disappointment for every term that has been legitimated in the nomenclature of the science. This desideratum he is enabled to attempt in successive editions, by reason of the work not being stereotyped."

The present carefully revised and greatly enlarged edition cannot fail to be more extensively useful, and offers stronger claims to the attention of the practitioner and student than any of its predecessors.

The author gladly iterates the testimony borne by him, in the preface to the last edition, to the assiduity and accuracy impressed on the typographical department by Mr. Young, who printed also the four preceding editions.

ROBLEY DUNGLISON:

PHILADELPHIA, September, 1848.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

---

THE present undertaking was suggested by the frequent complaints, made by the author's pupils, that they were unable to meet with information on numerous topics of professional inquiry,—especially of recent introduction,—in the medical dictionaries accessible to them.

It may, indeed, be correctly affirmed, that we have no dictionary of medical subjects and terms which can be looked upon as adapted to the state of the science. In proof of this, the author need but remark, that he has found occasion to add several thousand medical terms, which are not to be met with in the only medical lexicon at this time in circulation in the country.

The present edition will be found to contain many hundred terms more than the first, and to have experienced numerous additions and modifications.

The author's object has not been to make a mere lexicon or dictionary of terms, but to afford, under each, a condensed view of its various medical relations, and thus to render the work an epitome of the existing condition of medical science. In its preparation, he has freely availed himself of the English, French, and German works of the same nature, and has endeavoured to add every subject and term of recent introduction, which has fallen under his notice; yet, with all his care, it will doubtless be found that subjects have been omitted. The numerous additions, however, which he has made, and his strong desire to be useful, "by removing rubbish and clearing obstructions from the paths through which learning and genius press forward to conquest and glory," will, he trusts, extenuate these and other objections that might be urged against the work; especially when the toil, which every compiler of a dictionary must endure, is taken into consideration; a toil which has been so forcibly depicted by the great English Lexicographer, as well as by the distinguished SCALIGER:

*" Si quelqu'un a commis quelque crime odieux, S'il a tué son père, ou blasphémé les Dieux,
Qu'il fasse un Lexicon: s'il est supplice au monde
Qui le punisse mieux, je veux que l'on me tonde."*

EXPLANATION.

If the simple synonymy of any term be needed, a mere reference to the term may be sufficient; but if farther information be desired, it may be obtained under the term referred to. For example, the French word Tronc is said to be synonymous with Trunk. This may be sufficient for the inquirer; should it not, the requisite information may be found by turning to Trunk.

Manubris*, Extensor ossis metacarpi pollicis manubris, Extensor primi internodii—(Douglas.) Extensor primus Pollicis, Cubito-radi-sus-metacarpium du pouce, Cubito-sus-metacarpium du pouce,—(Ch.) (F.) Abducteur long du pouce. A long, thin muscle, arising from the posterior surface of the ulna, radius, and interosseous ligament, and inserted at the outer side of the upper extremity of the first metacarpal bone.

ABDUCTOR POLLICIS PEDIS, Calcophalangicus Pollicis. (F.) Abducteur du gros orteil. This muscle arises, fleshy, from the anterior and inner part of the protuberance of the os calcis, and tendinous from the same bone where it joins with the os naviculare. It is inserted, tendinous, into the internal os sesamoideum and root of the first bone of the great toe. Use. To pull the great toe from the rest.

The name Abductor has been given also to all those interosseous muscles of the hand and foot, which perform the motion of abduction on the fingers or toes, and to muscles which execute the same function on other parts of the body.

ABERRATION, Aberratio, from aberrare, (ab and errare), 'to stray,' 'to wander from.' This word has several meanings.

1. The passage of a fluid of the living body into an order of vessels not destined for it. In this sense it is synonymous with the Error Loci of Boerhaave.

2. The flow of a fluid towards an organ different from that to which it is ordinarily directed; as in cases of vicarious hemorrhage. Aberrations of sensus or judgment are certain errors in the perceptions, or certain derangements of the intellectual faculties.

The word is used in optics to designate the dispersion of the rays of light in passing through a lens.

ABERRATION, CHROMATIC, Aberration of Refrangibility—a. Spherical, Aberration of sphericity.

ABERRATION OF REFRACTIBILITY, Chromatic aberration, exists, when, as in a common lens, the rays that pass near the circumference of the lens are decomposed, so that a coloured image is observed. This aberration in the human eye is corrected by the iris, which does not permit the rays to fall near the circumference of the lens, and also by the crystalline lens itself, which, owing to its structure, serves the purposes of an achromatic glass.

ABERRATION OF SPHERICITY or spherical aberration takes place, when the rays, as in a common lens, which pass through the centre of the lens, and those which pass near the circumference, are unequally refracted, so that they do not meet at a common focus.

This aberration of sphericity in the human eye is corrected by the iris.

The function of absorbent vessels, by virtue of which they take up substances from without or within the body. Two great divisions have been made of this function. 1. External absorption, or the absorption of composition, which obtains from without the organs the materials intended for their composition; and, 2. Internal absorption, or the absorption of decomposition, which takes up from the organs the materials that have to be replaced by the exhalants.

By external absorption is meant not only that which takes place at the external surface of the body, but also that of the mucous membranes of the digestive and respiratory passages. Hence, again, the division of external absorption into cutaneous—resorptio cutanea seu cutis, inhalatio cutis—intestinal or digestive, and pulmonary or respiratory.

Internal absorption is also subdivided into, 1. Molecular or interstitial, nutritive or organic, which takes up from each organ the materials that constitute it, so that the decomposition is always in equilibrio with the deposition. 2. The absorption of secretorial fluids, such as the fluid of serous membranes, synovia, &c. As these are constantly exhaled on surfaces which have no external outlet, they would augment indefinitely, if absorption did not remove them in the same proportion as that in which they are deposited. 3. The absorption of a part of the secretorial fluids, as they pass over the excretory passages.

Absorption does not effect the decomposition of the body immediately. It merely prepares the fluid which has to be eliminated by the secretory organs.

The great agents of external absorption are the veins and chyliiferous vessels; of internal absorption, probably the lymphatics. In the chyliiferous vessels and lymphatics the fluid is always found to possess the same general properties. In them, therefore, an action of elaboration or selection must have taken place. The veins, on the other hand, seem to exert no selection. Any fluid, possessing the necessary tenuity, passes through the coats of the vessel readily by imbibition, and proceeds along with the torrent of the circulation. Watery fluids in this manner enter the blood when they are taken into the stomach. Substances that require digestion, on the other hand, must pass through the chyliiferous vessels and thoracic duct.

At times, however, it is the 'solitary acephalocyst,' A. eremita seu ster'ilis.

The acephalocystis endog'ema has a firm coat, and is composed of different layers, which have numbers of smaller hydatids within them, and are thrown off from the interior of the parent cyst. Acidicum purum, Acetum radicalè, Oxos, Aceticum Acid, Strong Acetous Acid, Acidum Acetisum forte, Rad'ical Vin'egar, Spiritus Ver'oris* (when made from verdigris), Spirit of Verdigris. Concentrated acetic acid, prepared by decomposing an acetate and receiving the acetic acid by distillation, has a very pungent and grateful odour, and an acid and acrid taste. Its s. g. is about 1.046, and it is very volatile.

It is stimulant, rubefacient, and escharotic, and is applied to the nostrils in syncope, asphyxia, headache, &c. It destroys warts.

An Aromatic Spirit of Vinegar, Ad'idum Aceticum Camphoratum, A. acetisum camphoratum, is formed of this strong acid, ζvj, Camphor, ʒss, Ol. Caryoph. g' xv.

A strong Acetic Acid was ordered by the London pharmacopœia prepared from wood. It was called Vinegar of wood, Improved distilled Vinegar, Pyroligneous Acid, Acetum Ligno-rum, and its strength was such, that ʒj gr. of crystallized subcarbonate of soda should saturate 100 grains of the acid.

Ad'idum Aceticum Dilutum, A. a. ter'tiè, Acetum destillatum, Acidum aceticum, Acidum acetisum destillatum, Acidum aceticum debilius, Distilled vinegar, (F.) Acido Acetique faible, Vinaigre distillé, is prepared by distilling vinegar, until seven-eighths have passed over. An Acidum aceticum dilutum, Diluted acetic acid, is made by mixing half a pint of the strong acetic acid with five pints of distilled water.—Ph. U. S. Its properties are like those of vinegar.

ACETICUM MARTIALE, Ferri Acetas.

AC'ETONE, from acetum, 'vinegar.' Pyro-acetic spirit, Pyro-acetic Ether, Merit'ic Alcohol, Bihydrate of Merit'yloxe; erroneously called Naptha and Wood Naptha. A limpid, colourless liquid, having a peculiarly penetrating and slightly empyreumatic odour. Its density in the liquid state, is almost the same as that of alcohol, 0.7921. Its taste is disagreeable, and analogous to that of peppermint. It is miscible in all proportions with water, alcohol, and ether. It may be prepared by distilling a mixture of two parts of crystallized acetate of lead and one part of quicklime in a salt-glaze jar (gray-beard), the lower part of the jar being coated with fire-clay; and a bent glass tube, half an inch in diameter, adapted to the mouth by a cork, so as to form a distillatory apparatus. The jar is supported on the mouth of a small furnace, by which the lower part only is heated to redness, and the vapours are conducted into a Liebig's condenser. The product is repeatedly redistilled from quicklime, until its boiling point is constant at 132°.

It has been brought forward as a remedy in phthisis pulmonalis; but evidently with unfounded pretensions. It is an excitant, and may be serviceable in chronic bronchitis. The dose is ten to forty drops three times a day, diluted with water.

Fossius thinks the word ought to be Acme, and, according to Cassius, it is, at all events, derived from αμη, 'vigour;' the disease affecting those in the vigour of life, especially.

Willan and Bateman have adopted the term in their Nosology of cutaneous diseases, and placed it in the Order, TUBERCULA. Acne, with them, is an eruption of distinct, hard, inflamed tubercles, sometimes continuing for a considerable length of time, and sometimes suppurating slowly and partially. They usually appear on the forehead, temples and chin; and are common to both sexes; but the most severe forms are seen in young men. They require but little management, and consist of four varieties; Acne indurata, A. simplex, (Haploëcne), A. punctata (Ion'thus varus punctatus, Puncta mucosa, Comedo'nes or Maggot Pimple), and A. rosacea.—See Gutta Rosea.

A strong, fibrous, and resisting membrane, which immediately envelops the testicle, and has, at its upper part, an enlargement, called corpus Highmorianum. It always forms fasciæ or fasciculi, which constitute the tendons, articular ligaments, and aponeuroses: hence the name Albugineous membranes, given by Chaussier to the fibrous membranes.

Gauthier considers that the rete mucosum consists of four layers, to two of which he gives the names,—membrana albugin'ea profun'da, and membrana albugin'ea superficialis, respectively.

properties. Also, the white of the eye. See Sclerotic.

AL'CALI or Alca'li, Al'kali, from al (Arab.) 'the,' and kali, the name of the Salsola Soda, a plant which contains a large quantity of one of the principal alkalis—soda. The alkalis are substances soluble in water, possessing generally a urinous, acrid, and caustic taste, turning the syrup of violets green, and restoring to blue the infusion of litmus, which has been reddened by acids; reddening the yellow of turmeric, and having the greatest tendency to unite with acids, whose character they modify, and form salts with them. This word was formerly synonymous with Chymistry; but, from the 7th century, it has been applied to the mysterious art of endeavouring to discover a universal remedy, and a mode of transmuting the baser metals into gold: an operation to which they gave the name Opus magnum, and Philosopher's stone.

Alchemy has also been called Sciencia vel Philosoph'ica Hermet'ica, from an idea that Hermes or Mercury was its inventor.

Harris has well defined this chimerical art: 'Ars sine arte, cujus principium est mentiri, medium laborare, et finis mendicare.'

At the present day it is applied to highly rectified spirit of wine:—see Spiritus rectificatus or rectified spirit, distilled from dried subcarbonate of potassa. In the Ph. U. S. Alcohol is rectified spirit of the specific gravity 0.835.

Alcohol is an inflammable liquor, lighter than water, of a warm, acrid taste, colourless, transparent, and of a pungent, aromatic smell. It is the product of the distillation of vinous liquors; is miscible with water in all proportions, and is the direct solvent of resins, balsams, &c. Various other vegetable principles are soluble in it, and hence it is used, in different states of concentration, in the preparation of elixirs, tinctures, essences, &c.

Alcohol acts on the animal body as a powerful stimulus: as such, in a dilute form, it is used in the prevention and cure of disease. Its habitual and inordinate use is the cause of many serious affections, of a chronic character especially, as visceral obstructions, dropsy, &c.

The patient lying on his mattress, the surgeon passes the linen belts beneath his body, attaching them to the hooks on the ends of the straps, and adjusting the whole at the proper distance and length, so as to balance the body exactly, and then raises it from the mattress by turning the handle of the windlass. ANAT'OMY, Anat'omē, Anatom'ia, Prosectio, from ana, and τεμνειν, 'to cut,' (F.) Anatomis. The word Anatomy properly signifies dissection; but it has been appropriated to the study and knowledge of the number, shape, situation, structure, and connexion,—in a word, of all the apparent properties of organized bodies. Anatomy is the science of organization. Some have given the term a still more extended acceptation, applying it to every mechanical decomposition, even of inorganic bodies. Thus, Crystallography has been termed the Anatomy of crystallized minerals. Anatomy has also been called Morphology, Somatology, Somatotomy, Organology, &c. It assumes different names according as the study is confined to one organized being, or to a species or class of beings. Thus, Androtomy, or Anthropotomy, or Anthropography, or Anthroposomatology, is the Anatomy of man:—Zootomy, that of the other species of the animal kingdom: and Veterinary Anatomy is the anatomy of domestic animals: but when the word is used abstractly, it means human Anatomy, and particularly the study of the organs in a physiological or healthy state. Physiological Anatomy is occasionally used to signify the kind of anatomy which investigates structure with a special view to function. The Anatomy of the diseased human body is called Pathological or Morbid Anatomy, and when applied to Medical Jurisprudence, Forensic Anatomy. Several of the organs possessing a similarity of structure, and being formed of the same tissues, they have been grouped into Systems or Genera of Organs; and the study of, or acquaintance with, such systems, has been called General Anatomy, Histology, or Morphology, whilst the study of each organ in particular has been termed Descriptive Anatomy. Descriptive Anatomy has been divided into Skeletology which comprises Osteology, and Syn-desmology; and into Sarcology, which is subdivided into Myology, Neurology, Angiology, Adenology, Splanchnology, and Dermology. Surgical Anatomy, Medico-Chirurgical Anatomy, Topographical Anatomy, Regional Anatomy, (F.) Anatomie Chirurgicale, A. des Régions, is the particular and relative study of the bones, muscles, nerves, vessels, &c., with which it is indispensable to be acquainted before performing operations. Comparative Anatomy is the comparative study of each organ, with a view to an acquaintance with the modifications of its structure in different animals or in the different classes of animals. Transcendental or Philosophical Anatomy inquires into the mode, plan, or model upon which the animal frame or organs are formed; and Artificial Anatomy is the art of modelling and representing in wax or other substance, the different organs or different parts of the human body, in the sound or diseased state. Phytology is the anatomy of vegetables.

There are various kinds of aneurism. The following are the chief.

I. When the blood, which forms the tumour, is enclosed within the dilated coats of the artery. This is the true aneurism, Aneurys'ma circumscriptum, Hernia Arteriarum, (F.) Anévrysmo vrai.

II. When the blood has escaped from the opened artery, it is called spurious or false aneurism, Aneuris'ma spurium, Ruptura Artēriæ, Arteriorrhæ'is, Arteriodial'ysis, Ecchymo'ma arterio'sum, (F.) Anévrysmo faux. The latter is divided into three varieties.

1. The diffused false aneurism, (F.) Anévrysmo faux, primitif, diffus, nonconscript ou par infiltration, which occurs immediately after the division or rupture of an artery, and consists of an extravasation of blood into the cellular texture of the part.

2. The circumscribed false aneurism, (F.) A. faux conscripti, circonscript ou par épanchement, enkysté ou sacciforme, tumeur hémorrhagiale circonscripte, in which the blood issues from the vessel some time after the receipt of the wound, and forms itself a sac in the neighbouring cellular membrane.

3. The Aneurism by Anastomosis, or Varicose Aneurism, Phlebarteriodial'ysis, Aneurys'ma veno'ar-terio'sum, A. varico'sum, (F.) Anévrysmo par anastomose ou variqueux, A. par érosion, A. de PORT, A. des plus petites artères, which arises from the simultaneous wounding of an artery and vein;—the arterial blood passing into the vein, and producing a varicose state of it.

III. Mixed Aneurism, (F.) Anévrysmo mixte, is that which arises from the dilatation of one or two of the coats, with division or rupture of the other. Some authors have made two varieties of this.

1. Mixed external Aneurism, where the internal and middle coats are ruptured, and the cellular is dilated.

2. Mixed internal Aneurism, in which the internal coat is dilated, and protrudes, like a hernial sac, through the ruptured middle and outer coats. This variety has been called Aneurys'ma Herniam Artēriæ sistens.

Aneurisms have been likewise termed traumatic and spontaneous, according as they may have been caused by a wound, or have originated spontaneously. They have also been divided into internal and external.

The internal aneurisms are situate in the great splanchnic cavities, and occur in the heart and great vessels of the chest, abdomen, &c. Their diagnosis is difficult, and they are often inaccessible to surgical treatment.

The external aneurisms are situate at the exterior of the head, neck, and limbs, and are distinctly pulsatory.

Aneurisms, especially the internal, may be combated by a debilitating treatment, on the plan of Valsalva, which consists in repeated blood-letting, with food enough merely to support life. In external aneurism, the artery can be obliterated. This is usually done by applying a ligature above the aneurismal tumour.

ANEURISM, DUSKETING, is one in which, owing to rupture of the inner and middle coats of an artery, the blood makes itself a channel between these coats and the outer coat.

In many cases, the lesion appears to consist in a separation of the lamina of the middle coat, between which the blood forms itself a channel.

ANEURISMS OF THE HEART, Cardionœsis, Cardiorrhisma, (F.) Anévrysmes du cœur, have been divided into actives and passives. The former can scarcely be esteemed aneurisms, as they most commonly consist of increased thickness of the parietes of the heart, which diminishes its cavity instead of increasing it. The term Hypertrophy of the heart, (q. v.) better indicates their character. Passive aneurism, Cardiectasis, on the contrary, is attended with extenuation of the parietes of the organ, and enlargement of the cavities. The physical signs of dilatation of the heart are the following:—The action of the heart is not visible, and no impulse is conveyed to the hand. On percussion, there is a loss of resonance over a larger surface than usual, but the dulness is much less intense than that which accompanies hypertrophy. On auscultation, the action of the heart is only slightly felt, and communicates at once the impression of its diminished power. The impulse is feebler than usual. Both sounds are widely transmitted over the thorax, and are not much fainter at a distance from their point of origin.

Partial or true aneurism of the heart—Cardiectasis parialis, Aneurysma consecutum cordis, is sometimes seen,—rarely, however.

The name Aneurism of the Valves of the heart has been given to pouch-like projections of the valves into the auricles.

A disease, the precise pathology of which is not known. The principal symptoms are, violent pain about the sternum, extending towards the arms; anxiety, dyspnœa, and sense of suffocation. It is an affection of great danger, and is often connected with ossification, or other morbid affection of the heart. It appears to be neuropathic, and has been termed Neuralgia of the Heart. Some, however, employ this last term for an acutely painful intermittent affection of the heart, which seems to differ from angina pectoris more in regard to the small number of parts which are drawn into morbid consent with the affected cardiac nerves, than in regard either to its nature or appropriate treatment. The most powerful stimulating and narcotic antispasmodics are required during the paroxysm.

ANGINA PELLICULARIS, A. maligna, Diphtheriitis (q. v.) of the throat. ANGLE, Αγγυλος, from αγγυλος, 'a hook.' The space between two lines which meet in a point.

ANGLE, FA'CIAL, pointed out by Camper, is drawn from the union of two lines, one of which is drawn from the most prominent part of the forehead to the alveolar edge of the upper jaw, opposite the incisor teeth, and the other from the meatus auditorius externus to the same point of the jaw. According to the size of the angle it has been attempted to appreciate the respective proportions of the cranium and face, and, to a certain extent, the degree of intelligence of individuals and of animals. In the white varieties of the species, this angle is generally 80°; in the negro not more than 70°, and sometimes only 65°. As we descend the scale of animals, the angle becomes less and less; until, in fishes, it nearly or entirely disappears. Animals which have the snout long, and facial angle small, such as the snipe, crane, stork, &c., are proverbially foolish, at least they are so esteemed; whilst intelligence is ascribed to those in which the angle is more largely developed, as the elephant and the owl. In these last animals, however, the large facial angle is caused by the size of the frontal sinuses:—so that this mode of appreciating the size of the brain is very inexact, and cannot be depended upon.

The following is a table of the angle in man and certain animals:

	FACIAL ANGLES.
Man	from 65° to 85°
Sapajou	65
Orang-Utang	56 to 54
Guenon	57
Mandrill	30 to 42
Coati	23
Pole-cat	31
Fug-dog	35
Mastiff	41
Hare	30
Ram	39
Horse	23

ANGLE, OCCIPITAL, OF DAUBENTON, is formed by a line drawn from the posterior margin of the foramen magnum to the inferior margin of the orbit, and another drawn from the top of the head to the space between the occipital condyles. In man, these condyles, as well as the foramen magnum, are so situate, that a line drawn perpendicular to them would be a continuation of the spine; but in animals they are placed more or less obliquely; and the perpendicular is necessarily thrown farther forward, and the angle rendered more acute.

ANGLE, OPTIC, (F.) Anglo optique, is the angle formed by two lines, which shave the extremities of an object, and meet at the centre of the pupil.

The Anima of Stahl, An'ima Stahlia'na, was a fancied intelligent principle, which he sup-posed to preside over the phenomena of life,—like the Archæus of Van Helmont.

Under the term Anima mundi, the ancient philo-sophers meant a universal Spirit, which they supposed spread over every part of the universe.

The precise seat of the mind in the brain has given rise to many speculations. The point is unsettled.

With the ancient chemists, Anima meant the active principle of a drug separated by some chemical management.

This formation seems to take place over the whole of the body, and to be connected with the ac-tion of nutrition.

ANIMIST', from anima, 'the soul.' One who, following the example of Stahl, refers all the phenomena of the animal economy to the soul.

The soul, according to Stahl, is the immediate and intelligent agent of every movement, and of every material change in the body. Stahl therefore concluded, that disease was nothing more than a disturbance or disorder in the government of the economy, or an effort by which the soul, attentive to every morbid cause, endeavoured to expel whatever might be deranging the habitual order of health.

ANIMUS, Anima, Breath.

ANIS, Pimpinella anisum—a. Aigre, Cuminum Cyminum—a. de la Chine, Illicium anisatum—a. Doux, Anethum—a. Étoilé, Illicium anisatum.

ANKYLOSIS, Ancylosis, Anchylosis, Anchyle, Stiff Joint, from αγκυλος, 'crooked.' An affection, in which there is great difficulty or even impossibility of moving a diarthrodial articulation. It is so called, because the limb commonly remains in a constant state of flexion. Anchylosis is said to be complete or true, when there is an intimate adhesion between the synovial surfaces with union of the articular extremities of the bones. In the incomplete or false anchylosis, there is obscure motion, but the fibrous parts around the joint are more or less stiff and thickened. It serves to retain the odontoid process of the axis in connexion with the anterior arch of the atlas.

ANNULAR LIGAMENT OF THE RA'DIUS, is a very strong fibro-cartilaginous band, which forms, with the lesser sigmoid cavity of the cubitus, a kind of ring in which the head of the radius turns with facility.

ANNULAR LIGAMENTS OF THE CARPUS, Annulæ manus membranosa, are two in number.

The one, anterior, is a broad, fibrous, quadrilateral band, extending transversely before the carpus, and forming the gutter, made by the wrist, into a canal. It is attached, externally, to the trapezium and scaphoides; and internally to the os pisiforme and process of the ulniforme. It keeps the tendons of the flexor muscles, median nerve, &c., applied against the carpus.

The posterior ligament is situate transversely behind the joint of the hand, and covers the sheaths of the tendons, which pass to the back of the hand. Its fibres are white and shining, and are attached, externally, to the inferior and outer part of the radius; internally, to the ulna and os pisiforme.

ANNULAR LIGAMENTS OF THE TARSUS are two in number. The anterior is quadrilateral, and extends transversely above the instep. It is attached to the superior depression of the os calcis, and to the malleolus internus. It embraces the tendons of the extensor muscles of the toes, the tibialis anticus, and peroneus anticus. The internal is broader than the last. It descends from the malleolus internus to the posterior and inner part of the os calcis, with which it forms a kind of canal, enclosing the sheaths of the tendons of the tibialis posticus, flexor longus digitorum pedis, and F. longus pollicis pedis, as well as the plantar vessels and nerves.

Externally, they are often used in fomentations.

The O'leum Anthem'idis possesses the aromatic properties of the plant, but not the bitter and tonic. Consequently, the 'Chamomile Drops,' as sold by the druggists, must be devoid of the latter qualities. They are made by adding Ol. anthem. f. ʒj. to Sp. vini rectific. Oj.

ANTHRACOSIS PULMONUM, see Melanosis.

ANTHRACOTYPHUS, Plague.

ANTHRAKOK'ALI, from ανθραξ, 'coal,' and κάλι, 'potassa.' An article introduced as a remedy in cutaneous diseases. It is formed by dissolving carbonate of potassa in 10 or 12 parts of boiling water, and adding as much slacked lime as will separate the potassa. The filtered liquor is placed on the fire in an iron vessel, and suffered to evaporate, until neither froth nor effervescence occurs, and the liquid presents a smooth surface like oil. To this, levigated coal is added in the proportion of 160 grammes to 192 grammes of potassa. The mixture is stirred, and removed from the fire, and the stirring is continued, until a black homogeneous powder results. A sulphuretted anthrakokali is made by mixing accurately 16 grammes of sulphur with the coal, and dissolving the mixture in the potassa as directed above. The dose of the simple and sulphuretted preparations is about two grains three times a day.

In the latter case it is called, Anthra'cion, Vescicula gangranosus, Anthracophlyctis, Pustule maligne; Bouton d'Alep, Feu Persique (Persian Fire), Malvat, Bouton malin, Puce maligne, and is characterized at the outset by a vesication or bleb filled with a sero-sanguinolent fluid, under which a small induration is formed, surrounded by an areolar inflammation, which becomes gangrenous. It has been thought by some to be induced altogether by contact with the matter of the carbuncle of animals, or of the exuvie of bodies of such as had died of the disease. But it is now known to arise primarily in the human subject.

Anthrax is a malignant boil, and its treatment is similar to that which is required in cases of gangrene attacking a part.

The ancients called every white part νεῦρον, and regarded the Aponeurosis as a nervous expansion. The Aponeuroses are white, shining membranes, very resisting, and composed of fibres interlaced. Some are continuous with the muscular fibres, and differ only from tendons by their flat form. They are called Aponeuroses of insertion, (F.) Aponévroses d'insertion, when they are at the extremities of muscles, and attach them to the bone;—Aponeuroses of intersection, (F.) Aponévroses d'intersection, if they interrupt the continuity of the muscle, and are continuous on both sides with muscular fibres. Others surround the muscle, and prevent its displacement: they are called enveloping Aponeuroses, (F.) Aponévroses d'enveloppe.

Hémorrhagie interstitielle,* or every effusion of blood, which occurs suddenly into the substance of an organ or tissue. Hence, we speak of cerebral apoplexy, pulmonary apoplexy, &c. &c. Formerly it was always—and still is by many—used in an entirely symptomatic sense, to signify, in other words, the train of phenomena, which characterize cerebral apoplexy. This disease, *Hæmorrhægia Cerebri, Aphro'nia, Carus Apoplexia, Coma Apoplexia, Apoplexia cerebri sanguinea, A. cerebralis, Encephalorrhægia, Sanguinis cæcus, Hæmatencephalum, Pulposia, Sideratio, Apilepsia, Morbus atonicus, Gutta, Theopledia, Theoplexia, (F.) It generally consists in pressure upon the brain; either from turgescence of vessels, or from extravasation of blood; hence the terms Hæmatencephalum, Hémorrhagie cérébrale, and Hématoencephalorrhagie, applied to it by some. The general prognosis is unfavourable; especially when it occurs after the age of 35. When Apoplexy is accompanied with a hard, full pulse, and flushed countenance, it is called Apoplexia sanguinea, Cataphora coma; when with a feeble pulse and pale countenance, and evidences of serous effusion, Apoplexia serosa, A. pituitosa, Serous Apoplexy, Cataphora hydrocephalica, Encephalochyisis senilis, Hydrocephalus acutus senium, Hydroencephalorrhée, (Piorry,) Hydropiæ cérébrale suraiguë, Hydroorrhagie.

In surgery it means the methodical arrangement of all the instruments and objects necessary for an operation or dressing. By extension, the French give the name Appareil, Casse chirurg'ique, to the case or drawers in which the apparatus is arranged.

Apparatus has likewise been applied to the different modes of operating for the stone.—See Lithotomy.

In Physiology, Apparatus (Appareil) is applied to a collection of organs, all of which work towards the same end. A system of organs comprehends all those formed of a similar texture. The first, as a whole, form the organs of the mental faculties: the latter are commissures, which unite parts of the organ that are double and in pairs.

APPETITE, Appeti'tus, Appeten'tia, Appeti'tia, (ad and petere,) 'to seek,' Cupi'do, Ore'is, Ornē: same etymology as the last. An internal sensation, which warns us of the necessity of exerting certain functions, especially those of digestion and generation. In the latter case it is called venereal appetite, (F.) Appetit vénérien: in the former, simply appetite, (F.) Appetit or Appetition. If the desire for food, occasioned by a real want, be carried to a certain extent, it is called hunger, when solid food is concerned; thirst, when liquid. Appetite and hunger ought not, however, to be employed synonymously: they are different degrees of the same want. Hunger is an imperious desire: it cannot be provoked, like the appetite. It is always allayed by eating: but not so the appetite; for, at times, it may be excited in this manner. They are very generally, however, used synonymously.

APPETITE, MORBID, Limosis.

A name given to several membranes, which, by their extreme thinness, resemble spider-webs.—Celsus and Galen called thus the membrane of the vitreous humour,—the tunica hyaloides. The moderns use it now for one of the membranes of the brain, situated between the dura mater and pia mater. It is a serous membrane, and composed of two layers; the external being confounded, in the greater part of its extent, with the dura mater, and, like it, lining the interior of the cranium and spinal canal; the other being extended over the brain, from which it is separated by the pia mater, without passing into the sinuosities, between the convolutions, and penetrating into the interior of the brain by an opening at its posterior part under the corpus callosum. It forms a part of the investing sheath of the nerves, as they pass from the encephalic cavities. Its chief uses seem to be;—to envelop, and, in some measure, protect the brain, and to secrete a fluid for the purpose of keeping it in a state best adapted for the proper performance of its functions.

ARENULA, see Gravel.

AREOLA. A diminutive of Area. Anatomists understand by Areola, the interstices between the fibres composing organs; or those existing between laminae, or between vessels which interlace with each other.

Areola is, also, applied to the coloured circle Halo, Halos, which surrounds the nipple; Are'ola papilla'ris, and which becomes much darker during pregnancy; as well as to the circle surrounding certain vesicles, pustules, &c., as the pustules of the small-pox, the vaccine vesicle, &c. Chaussier, in such cases, recommends the word Aure'ola, (F.) Auriale, Airs.

AREOLA PAPILLARIS, see Areola.

ARE'OLAR, Areola'ris. Appertaining to an areola.

AREOLAR EXHALATIONS are those recremental secretions, which are effected within the organs of sense, or in parenchymatous structures,—as the aqueous, crystalline and vitreous humours, &c.

AREOLAR TISSUE, Cellular Tissue.

AREOMETER, Araom'eter, Gravim'eter, Alcoëlo'm'eter, Ætostat'io Balances, from aqueo, 'light,' and μετρος, 'measure' i. e. 'measure of lightness.' An instrument, so called, because first employed to take the specific gravity of fluids lighter than water. The Areometer of Beaumé, which is the most used in Pharmacy, particularly in France, consists of a tube of glass, largely expanded towards its inferior extremity, and terminating, below, by a small ball, containing mercury or lead, which serves it as a balance, so that it may remain upright in the fluid. This tube is furnished with a graduated scale. If the fluid into which the Areometer is plunged be heavier than water, the instrument rises: if lighter, it sinks. There are various Arometers, as those of the Dutch, of Fahrenheit, Nicholson, &c. The Arometer is also called Hydrometer, (F.) Arbomètre, Pèso-liquour.

ARES. A term invented by Paracelsus to designate the principle on which depends the form of mercury, sulphur, and salt. These the alchemists regarded as the three bodies that give birth to every other.

spot or ulceration of the eye.—Hippocrates. See Leucoma.

ARGENTI NITRAS, Argentum Nitratum, Sal argenti, Argentum Nitricum, (F.) Nitrate d'Argent, Asotate d'Argent, Nitrate of Silver. This preparation is sometimes kept in crystals, the Nitras Argenti in crystallos concretus, Nitras d'Argent crystallisé of the Codex of Paris. Luna potabilis, Crystalis Lunæ, Argentum nitricum crystallisatum, Nitras argenti crystallinus, Nitrum lundrè, Hydrago'gum Boz'LEM. Generally, however, it is in the fused state: and it is this which is admitted into most Pharmacopœias, and which, besides the name Nitras Argenti, is called Nitras argenti fusus, Cautiv'cum lundrè, Lapis infernalis, Argentum nitricum fusum, and lunar caustic, (F.) Nitrate d'argent fondu, Pierre infernale.

In the Pharmacopœia of the United States, it is directed to be prepared as follows: Take of silver, in small pieces, ℥ij.; nitric acid, f. ℥v. distilled water, f. ℥ij. Mix the acid with the water, and dissolve the silver in the mixture in a sand bath; then gradually increase the heat, so that the resulting salt may be dried. Melt this in a crucible over a gentle fire, and continue the heat until ebullition ceases; then immediately pour it into suitable moulds.

The virtues of nitrate of silver are tonic, and escharotic. It is given in chorea, epilepsy, &c.; locally, it is used in various cases as an escharotic. Dose, gr. 1-8 to gr. 1-4 in pill, three times a day.

When silver is combined with iodine, it is said to have the same effect as the nitrate, and not to produce the slate colour of the surface, which is apt to follow the protracted use of the latter.

ARGENTI OXIDUM, see Argentum.

ARGENTINE, Potentilla anserina.

ARGENTUM, Argyrum, from ἀργός, 'white.' Silver, Luna, Dia'na, (F.) Argent. A solid metal of a shining white appearance; insipid; inodorous; highly sonorous; malleable and ductile; somewhat hard; crystallizable in triangular pyramids; fusible a little above a red heat, and volatilizable; s. g. 10.4. Not used at all in medicine, unless in some places for silvering pills. SILVER LEAF, Argentum foliatum, is the state in which it is used for this purpose.

ARGENTUM DIVINUM, metallic silver, in very fine powder, has been recommended internally in syphilis.

The CHLORIDE (Argentum chloridum, Argentum muriaticum, A. chloratum, A. salitum, Chloruretum Argentum, Chloruret or Muriate of Silver, (F.) Chlorure d'Argent;) the CYANURET; the IODIDE (Argentum iodidum, Argentum Iodatium, Ioduretum Argentum, Ioduret of Silver, (F.) Iodure d'Argent;) the OXIDE (Argentum oxidum, Argentum oxydatum, (F.) Oxide d'Argent, and the CHLORIDE of AMMONIA and SILVER (Argentum et Ammonia chloridum, Argentum muriaticum ammoniatum, Chloruretum Argentum et Ammonia, Chloruret of Silver and Ammonia, Ammonio-chloride of Silver, (F.) Chlorure d'Argent et d'Ammoniaque, have been used in syphilis. At first, these different preparations were administered intraleptically on the gums; the chloride, the cyanide and the iodide in the dose of 1-12th of a grain; the chloride of silver and ammonia in the dose of 1-14th of a grain, and the oxide of silver and divided silver in the dose of 1-8th and 1-4th of a grain. M. Serre, of Montpellier, who made many trials with them, soon found that these doses were too small; he therefore raised that of the chloride to 1-10th, and of the iodide to 1-8th of a grain, without any inconvenience resulting. The dose of the other preparations was likewise increased in a similar ratio. M. Serre extols the preparations of silver—used internally as well as intraleptically—as antisiphilitic, but they are not to be depended upon.

The Cyanuret or Cyanide of Silver, Argentum Cyanuretum, A. Cyanidum, Argentum cyanogenatum, (F.) Cyanure d'argent, is thus directed to be prepared in the Ph. U. S. (1842.) Argent. Nit. ꝑ. xv. Acid Hydrocyan. Aq. destillat. ʒ. ʒj. Having dissolved the nitrate of silver in the water, add the hydrocyanic acid, and mix them. Wash the precipitate with distilled water and dry it.

It is made by triturating 6.06 grains of metallic arsenic; 14.52 grains of mercury; 49 of iodine, with a fluidrachm of alcohol, until the mass has become dry, and from being deep brown has become pale red. Eight ounces of distilled water are poured on, and after trituration for a few moments, the whole is transferred to a flask; half a drachm of hydriodic acid, prepared by the acidification of two grains of iodine is added, and the mixture is boiled for a few moments. When the solution is cold, make the mixture up to f. ʒviij with distilled water. This is called by Mr. Donovan, the proposer, Liquor Arsen'ici et Hydrargyri Iodidi, each drachm of which by measure consists of water ʒj, arsenic acid gr. 1-8th; peroxide of mercury gr. 1-4th, iodine converted into hydriodic acid gr. 3-4ths. ARTERIOTOMY, Arterioto'mia, from αρτηρια, 'an artery,' and τομω, 'I cut.' This word has been used for the dissection of arteries. Most commonly, however, it means a surgical operation, which consists in opening an artery, to draw blood from it. Arteriotomy is chiefly used in inflammatory affections of the head, when the blood is generally obtained from the temporal artery. See Blood-letting.

ARTERITIS, Arteri'itis, Inflam'matio Arteriarum, (F.) Artrite, Inflammation des artères; from αρτηρια, 'an artery,' and itis, a termination denoting inflammation. Inflammation of an artery. Inflammation of the inner coat of the artery is termed Endo-arteri'itis, or Endo-arteri'itis; of the outer, Ezo-arteri'itis or Ex-arteri'itis.

ARTERY, Arter'ia, (F.) Artère, from αερ, 'air,' and τηρειν, 'to preserve,' quasi, 'receptacle of air,' because the ancients believed that it contained air. They, at first, gave the name Artery to the trachea, αρτηρια τραχεια, because it is filled with air; and afterwards they used the same term for the arteries, properly so called, probably because they commonly found them empty in the dead body. We find, also, φλεβες to designate the arteries, called by the Latins Vena micant'is pulsat'iles. Arteries, with the moderns, signify that order of vessels, which arise from the two ventricles of the heart, and have valves only at their origin. They are cylindrical, firm, and elastic canals; of a yellowish white colour; little dilatable; easily lacerable; and formed, 1. Of an external, laminated or cellular membrane, of a dense and close character. 2. Of a middle coat composed of fibres, which does not, however, contract on the application of the galvanic stimulus; and 3. Of an inner coat, which is thin, diaphanous, reddish, and polished.

The use of the arteries is to carry the blood from the heart to the various parts of the system. It will be obvious, however, that they cannot all convey arterial blood. The pulmonary artery, for example, is destined to convey the venous blood to the lungs, there to be converted into arterial; whilst the pulmonary veins convey arterial blood back to the heart.

TABLE OF THE PRINCIPAL ARTERIES OF THE BODY.

All the other arteries take their rise from the Pulmonary Artery, or the Aorta: and the names generally indicate the parts to which they are distributed.

I. ARTERIA PULMONARIS.

The Pulmonary Artery arises from the right ventricle, and soon divides into a right and left branch, one of which is distributed to each lung.

II. ARTERIA AORTA.

The Aorta arises from the left ventricle. It is the common trunk of the arteries of the body, and may be divided into five portions.

a. Arteries furnished by the Aorta at its origin.

1. A. Cardiaca or coronaria anterior.
2. A. Cardiaca or coronaria posterior.

b. Arteries furnished by the Aorta at its arch.

The arch of the Aorta gives off, to the left, two considerable trunks—the Arteria carotidea primitiva, and A. subclavia; and, to the right, a single trunk, which is larger—the A. innominata, or Brachio-cephalica, which divides into the primitiva carotid and subclavian.

A. ARTERIA CARD. Divides into A. Carotidea externa, and A. Carotidea interna.

ARTICULAR ARTERIES OF THE KNEE arise from the popliteal artery, and surround the tibio-femoral articulation. Although of a small size, they are important, as they furnish blood to the lower extremity after the operation for popliteal aneurism. They are distinguished into superior and inferior. The superior articular arteries, popliteal articular arteries, are commonly three in number: one of which is internal, another external, and another middle, the αγγους articular. The first, Ramus anastomoticus magnus, anastomoses by one branch with the external circumflex; and by another with the external superior articular. The second anastomoses with the external circumflex, the superior internal articular, and the inferior external articular; and the third is distributed within the joint. The inferior articular arteries are two in number: an internal and external. The former anastomoses with the internal superior articular and the external inferior articular. The latter anastomoses with the recurrent branch of the anterior tibial, and the external superior articular. To each articular artery there is an articular nerve.

ARTICULAR FACETTES are the contiguous surfaces, by means of which the bones are articulated.

ARTICULAR VEINS of the knee follow the same course as the arteries.

Owing to the supply of air being cut off, the unchanged venous blood of the pulmonary artery passes into the minute radicles of the pulmonary veins, but their peculiar excitability requiring arterial blood to excite them, stagnation takes place in the pulmonary radicles, and death occurs chiefly from this cause,—not owing to venous blood being distributed through the system, and 'poisoning' it, as was the idea of Bichat. Corus asphyxia, Mors app'arens, Mors putati'va, Pseudothan'atos, Apparent death, (F.) Morti app'arens, it is characterized by suspension of respiration, of the cerebral functions, &c. 3. ASPHYXIA BY STRANGULATION or Suffoca'tio; produced by mechanical impediment to respiration, as in strangulation.

4. ASPHYXIA BY SUBMERSION, A. by drown'ing, A. Immero'rum, as occurs in the drowned, who perish in consequence of the medium in which they are plunged, being unfit for respiration. See Submersion.

Difficulty of breathing, recurring at intervals, accompanied with a wheezing sound and sense of constriction in the chest; cough and expectoration.

Asthma is a chronic disease, and not curable with facility. Excitant and narcotic antispasmodics are required.

There are no pathognomonic physical signs of asthma. In some cases, the respiration is universally puerile during the attack. In the spasmodic form, the respiratory murmur is very feeble or absent during the fit; and in all forms percussion elicits a clear pulmonary sound. The disease generally consists in some source of irritation, and occasionally, perhaps, in paralysis of the pneumogastric nerves; more frequently of the former—all the phenomena indicating constriction of the smaller bronchial ramifications. The treatment is one that relieves spasmodic action—narcotics, counter-irritants, change of air, &c.

A disease of infants, characterized by suspension of respiration at intervals; great difficulty of breathing, especially on waking, swallowing, or crying, ending often in a fit of suffocation, with convulsions. The pathology of the disease has been supposed to consist in an enlargement of the thymus gland, (?) or of the glands of the neck pressing on the pneumogastric nerves. The ear, on auscultation, at a distance from the chest, detects an incomplete, acute, hissing inspiration, or rather cry; whilst the expiration and voice are croupal, both at the accession and termination of the paroxysm. The heart's action has been observed to be distinct and feeble.

In St. Vitus's dance, in fractures, luxations, &c., it is the great index. It will also indicate the degree of nervous or cerebral power; hence the sinking down in bed is an evidence of great cerebral debility in fever. The position of a patient during an operation is also an interesting subject of attention to the surgeon.

It is much used in chronic rheumatism, herpes, scrofulous diseases, &c.

AUDIT'ION, from audire, 'to hear;' Ac'ot, Audit'io, Audit'us, Ac'ot, Acro'ama, Acro'asis, Acot'is, Acu'is. Hearing. The act of hearing. The sensation arising from an impression made on the auditory nerves by the vibrations of the air, produced by a sonorous body. The physiology of Audition is obscure. It probably takes place:—1. By the vibrations being communicated from the membrana tympani along the chain of small bones to the membrane of the foramen ovale. 2. By means of the air in the cavity of the tympanum, the membrane of the foramen rotundum is agitated. 3. The transmission may be made by means of the bony parietes. In these three ways the vibrations produced by a sonorous body may reach the auditory nerve. Audition may be active or passive: hence the difference between listening and simple hearing.

AUDITORY, Audit'orius, Audit'ivus, Acus'ticus. That which relates to audition.

AUDITORY ARTERIES AND VEINS, are vessels which enter the auditory canals, and are, like them, distinguished into internal and external. The external auditory artery, *A. It is partly cartilaginous, partly osseous, and partly fibrous.

AUDITORY CANAL, INTERNAL, Med'tus audit'orius inter'nus, Porus seu Sinus acus'ticus, Cyar, (F.) Conduit auditif interne, C. labyrinthique, is situate in the posterior surface of the pars petrosa of the temporal bone. From the For'd men auditivum inter'num, where it commences, it passes forwards and outwards, and terminates by a kind of cul-de-sac, mac'ula cribro'sa, perforated by many holes, one of which is the orifice of the Aquæductus Fallopii; and the others communicate with the labyrinth.

AUDITORY NERVE, Ner'labyrinthique—(Ch.) is the Portio Mollis of the seventh pair. It arises from the corpus restiforme, from the floor of the fourth ventricle, and by means of white stræ, from the sides of the calamus scriptorius. As it leaves the encephalon, it forms a flattened cord, and proceeds with the facial nerve through the foramen auditivum internum, and as far as the bottom of the meatus, where it separates from the facial and divides into two branches, one going to the cochlea; the other to the vestibule and semi-circular canals.

AUGE, Aug'essus. Some of the older anatomists gave this name to a reservoir, into which liquids flow in an interrupted manner, so that it is alternately full and empty. Such are the ventricles and auricles of the heart.

In Pathology, Aura means the sensation of a light vapour, which, in some diseases, appears to set out from the trunk or limbs; and to rise towards the head. This feeling has been found to precede attacks of epilepsy and hysteria, and hence it has been called Aura Epileptica, and A. hysterica.

AURICLES OF THE HEART, Cavitates isonomiada, (F.) Oreillettes, are two cavities; one right, the other left, each communicating with the ventricle of its side. These two cavities receive the blood from every part of the body. Into the right auricle, the two venæ cavæ and coronary vein open: into the left, the four pulmonary veins. Chaussier calls the former the Sinus of the Venæ Cavæ:—the latter, the Sinus of the Pulmonary Veins. See Sinus.

They arise from the temporal artery, and are distributed to the meatus auditorius externus, and to the pavilion of the ear. The posterior auricular is given off by the external carotid, from which it separates in the substance of the parotid gland. When it reaches the inferior part of the pavilion of the ear it bifurcates; one of its branches being distributed to the inner surface of the pavilion, the other passing over the mastoid process, and being distributed to the temporal and posterior auris muscles, &c. Before its bifurcation it gives off the stylo-mastoid artery. The Anterior and Posterior Auricular Veins open into the temporal and external jugular.

AURICULAR FINGER, (F.) Doigt auriculaire, is the little finger, so called because, owing to its size, it can be more readily introduced into the meatus auditorius.

AURICULAR NERVES are several. 1. The auricular branch, Zygomato-auricular, is one of the ascending branches of the cervical plexus. It ramifies and spreads over the two surfaces of the pavilion. 2. The auricular or superficial temporal, Temporal-otitaneous—(Ch.) is given off from the inferior maxillary. It ascends between the condyle of the jaw and the meatus auditorius externus, sends numerous filaments to the meatus and pavilion, and divides into two twigs, which accompany the branches of the temporal artery, and are distributed to the integuments of the head. There is also a posterior auricular furnished by the facial.

This may be done by the aid of an instrument called a stethoscope (q. v.), one extremity of which is applied to the ear, the other to the chest of the patient. This mode of examination is called Mediate Auscultation, (F.) Auscultation mediate,—the application of the ear to the chest being immediate auscultation.

BAN'DAGE, Dama, Synder'mus, Hypodermis, Hypodermma, Hypoderm'mus, (the last three signify properly an under bandage.) A binder, from Sax. bindan, 'to bind.' This word, with the French, is generally used to express the methodical application of rollers, compresses, &c., Ban'daging, Syn'desis, to fix an apparatus upon any part,—corresponding to the words deligatio, fasciatio, fasciarum applicatio, epid-esis. With us the noun is usually applied to the result of the application, or to the bandage itself;—a sense in which the French employ the word Bande. Bandages are simple or compound. The simple bandage is equal, if the turns are applied circularly above each other; unequal, if the turns are not accurately applied upon each other. If each turn of the bandage be only covered one third, it forms the doloire of the French; if the edges touch only slightly, it is the moussé; if the turns are very oblique and separated, it is the spiral or creeping, (F.) rampant; if folded upon each other, it is termed the reverse, (F.) renversé. By uniting various kinds of bandaging, we have the compound; and these compound bandages have received various names expressive of their figure, or of the parts to which they are applied, as capistrum, spica, &c. Bandages are divided, also, as regards their uses, into uniting, dividing, retaining, expelling, compressing, &c.

BANDAGE OF ROLLER, Fas'cia, (q. v.) Tænia, Epidermos, Vin'culum, the Bande of the French is derived from (G.) binden, 'to bind.' It may be made of linen, flannel, or other stuff capable of offering a certain resistance. The two extremities of a bandage are called tails, (F.) chefs, and the rolled part is termed its head, (F.) globe. If rolled at both extremities, it is called a double-headed roller or bandage, (F.) Bande à deux globes.

BANDAGE, BODY, Mantille, (F.) Bandage de Corps, is used for fixing dressings, &c. to the trunk. It is formed of a towel, napkin, or some large compress, folded three or four times; the extremities of which are fastened by pins. This is again fixed by means of the scapular bandage, which is nothing more than an ordinary bandage, stitched to the anterior and middle part of the napkin, passing over the clavicles and behind the head, to be attached to the back part of the napkin.

BANDAGE, COMPRESSING, or ROLLER, Fascia compressiva seu convoluta, (F.) Bandage compressif ou roulé, is the simple roller with one head; and is employed in cases of ulcers, varices, &c. of the limbs. BLOOD, Anglo Saxon, blod, from bleban, 'to bleed.' Sanguis, Cruor, Lapis animalis, Hæma, αιμα, (F.) Sang. An animal fluid formed chiefly from the chyle; acquiring important properties during respiration; entering every organ through the circulation; distributing the nutritive principles to every texture, and the source of every secretion. The blood is white in the molluscous and inferior animals, which have been, hence, called white-blooded, to distinguish them from the red-blooded; which class includes the mammalia, birds, reptiles, and fishes. Human blood is composed of water, albumen, fibrin, an animal colouring substance, a little fatty matter—Åtomatela-rum, and different salts; as chlorides of potassium and sodium, phosphate of lime, carbonate of soda, lime, magnesia, oxide of iron, and lactate of soda, united with an animal matter. Arterial blood is of a florid red colour, strong smell, temp. 100°; s. g. 1.049. Venous blood is of a brownish red: temp. 98°; s. g. 1.051. This difference in colour has given occasion to the first being called red blood; the latter black. The former which is distributed from the heart, is nearly the same through its whole extent: the latter is the remains of the arterial blood after the different elements have been taken from it in nutrition, and probably differs in composition. It likewise contains different substances absorbed. Venous blood, taken from a vessel and left to itself, becomes solid, and separates into two distinct parts,—the serum or watery, supernatant fluid; and the cror, coagulum, crassamentum, hepar seu placenta sanguinis, placenta ororio, in/sula, thrombus, or clot. The serum is chiefly water, holding albumen in solution and the salts of the blood. The clot contains the fibrin, colouring matter—hamatosis, (q. v.) a little serum, and a small quantity of salts. M. Lecanu found the blood to be composed—in 1000 parts—of water, 785.590; albumen, 69.415; fibrin; 3.565; colouring matter, 119.626; crystallizable fatty matter, 4.300; oily matter, 2.270; extractive matter soluble in alcohol and water, 1.920; albumen combined with soda, 2.010; chlorides of sodium and potassium; alkaline phosphates, sulphates, and subcarbonates, 7.304; subcarbonate of lime and magnesia, phosphate of lime, magnesia and iron, peroxide of iron, 1.414; loss, 2.586. The four principal components of the blood are fibrin, albumen, corpuscles, and saline matter. In the circulating blood they are thus combined—

The proportion of arterial blood to venous is about 4 to 9.

Much attention has been paid to the varying condition of the blood in disease. The average proportion of each of the organic elements in 1000 parts of healthy blood is as follows, according to Lecanu, and MM. Andral, and Gavarret—fibrin, 3; red corpuscles, 127; solid matter of the serum, 80; water, 790.

Dried human blood was, at one time, considered to be antiepileptic; that of the goat, dried, Sanguis hirci siccatus, sudorific, and antipleuretic.

BLOOD-LETTING, Missio seu Detractio Sanguinis, Hæmæsis, Catasachismus, Bleeding, (F.) Saignée. A discharge of a certain quantity of blood produced by art: an operation which consists in making an opening into a vessel to draw blood from it. When practised on an artery, it is called Arteriotomy; on a vein, Phlebotomy, Venæsectio, Venæsection; and on the capillary vessels, local or capillary, in contradistinction to the former, which is termed general. Blood-letting is used both during the existence of a disease, as in inflammation, and in the way of prophylaxis. It is employed to fulfil various indications. 1. To diminish the actual mass of blood;—when it is termed, by the French pathologists, Saignée évacuative. In such case, fluids ought not to be allowed too freely afterwards. 2. To diminish the turgescence in any particular organ—(F.) Saignée révulsive, Revulsive blood-letting or bleeding, Venæsectio revulsoria, when performed far from the part affected; and Saignée dérivative, when near.) 3. To diminish the consistence of the blood, (F.) Saignée spoliative.) The immediate effects of blood-letting are: diminution of the mass of blood and of heat; retardation of the pulse, and sometimes syncope. Blood-letting from the veins—phlebotomy, is practised on the subcutaneous veins of the neck, the face, the fore-arm, and the leg; sometimes on those of the hand or foot. The necessary apparatus consists of a bandage or riband, a compress of rag, and a lancet or phleam.

The veins selected for the operation, are, 1. In the fold of the arm, five;—the cephalic, basilic, the two median, and the anterior cubital. 2. In the hand, the cephalic and salivata. 3. In the foot, the great and little saphena. 4. In the neck, the external jugular. 5. In the forehead, the frontal. 6. In the mouth, the ranine. The operation of phlebotomy in the limbs is performed by tying a circular bandage round the limb, in order that the subcutaneous veins may become turgid, by the course of the blood being obstructed: the bandage not being so tight, however, as to compress the arteries of the limb. A puncture is made into the vein, and the desired quantity allowed to flow. The ligature is now removed, and a compress and retaining bandage applied. Capillary or local blood-letting is practised on the skin or mucous membranes, by means of leeches, the lancet, or cupping.

The human body has, at the adult age, 208 bones, without including the 32 teeth, the ossa Wormiana, and the sesa-moid bones. Anatomists divide them, from their shape, into 1. Long bones, which form part of the limbs, and represent columns for supporting the weight of the body, or levers of different kinds for the muscles to act upon. 2. Flat Bones, which form the parietes of splanchnic cavities; and, 3. Short Bones, met with in parts of the body where solidity and some mobility are necessary. Bones are formed of two different textures; spongy and compact. They afford, on analysis, much phosphate and carbo-nate of lime, a little phosphate of magnesia, phosphate of ammonia, oxides of iron and man-ganese, some traces of alumina and silica, gela-tin, fat, and water. The uses of the bones are mentioned under each bone. They give shape to the body, contain and defend the viscera, and act as levers to the muscles.

BREDOUILLEMENT, (F.) Tituban'tia. A precipitate and indistinct mode of utterance, in which a part only of the words is pronounced, and several of the syllables viciously changed. This defect is analogous to stuttering, but differs from it in being dependent on too great rapidity of speech; whilst stuttering is characterized by continual hesitation, and frequent repetition of the same syllables.

BREGMA, Brechma, Brechmus, from βρέχειν, 'to sprinkle;' Fontanell'a, (q. v.) Sinciput (q. v.) The top of the head was thus called, because it was believed to be humid in infants; and, according to some, because it was conceived to correspond to the most humid part of the brain.

BRICKS, Fornac'ea Testa or Tiles, were formerly bruised in vinegar, and the liquid was used as a specific in cutaneous affections. They entered, also, into a cerate used for scrofulous humours, &c. To the Terra Fornac'ea, or Brick earth, the same virtues were assigned.

BRICUMUM, Artemisia.

BRIDE, (F.) A bridle. Fra'nulum, Retinaculum. This term is given, in the plural, to membranous filaments, which are found within abscesses or deep-seated wounds, and which prevent the exit of pus. The term is, also, applied to preternatural adhesions, which occur in cicatrices of the skin, in the urethra, or in inflamed serous or synovial membranes.

BRIGHTON, CLIMATE OF. The air of this fashionable watering place, on the south coast of England, is dry, elastic, and bracing. According to Sir James Clark, its climate appears to the greatest advantage in the autumn and early part of the winter; when it is somewhat milder and more steady than that of Hastings. Accordingly, it is adapted for all cases in which a dry and mild air at this season of the year proves beneficial. In the spring months, owing to the prevalence of, and its exposure to, north-east winds, the climate is cold, harsh, and exciting to the delicate. It is well adapted for convalescents, and for all who require a dry and bracing sea air.

BRONCHES, Bronchia—b. Ganglions lymphatiques des, Bronchial glands.

BRON'CHIA, Bron'chia, Bronchi, from βροχος, 'the throat.' The Latins used the term Bronchus, for the whole of the trachea; whilst they called its ramifications Bronchia. Bronchia, Bronchia, and Bronchi, (F.) Bronches, now mean the two tubes, with their ramifications, which arise from the bifurcation of the trachea, and carry air into the lungs,—Can'nula pulmo'num.

BRONCHIA, DILATATION OF THE, Dilated Bronchia. The physical signs of this condition are the following—Percussion usually clear, but not unfrequently less so than natural, although very seldom quite dull. Auscultation detects coarse mucous or gurgling rhonchi, increased by the cough, combined with, or replaced by, bronchial or cavernous respiration, which is often effected as if by a sudden puff or whiff. The resonance of the voice is increased, but it seldom amounts to perfect pectoriloquy. The most common situations for dilated bronchia are the scapular, mammary, or lateral regions. They are almost always confined to one side.

BRONCHIA, OBLITERATION, OR COMPRESSION OF THE. The inspiratory murmur on auscultation is weaker or wholly suppressed over a limited portion of the chest; the expiration is generally more distinct and prolonged: all the other conditions are natural.

BRONCHIAL, Bronchic, Bronchia'lis, Bronchicus. That which relates to the bronchia.

BRONCHIAL ARTERIES, (F.) Artères Bronchiques. These are generally two in number, one going to each lung. They arise from the thoracic aorta, and accompany the bronchia in all their ramifications.

BRONCHIAL CELLS, (F.) Cellules bronchiques. The Air-cells; the terminations of the bronchia.

BRONCHIAL COUGH, (F.) Toux bronchiale, T. tubaire. This generally accompanies bronchial respiration. They both indicate obstruction to the entrance of air into the air-cells.

BRONCHIAL GLANDS, Glan'dula Vesalia'næ, glands of Vesa'lius, (F.) Glandes bronchiques or Ganglions lymphatiques des bronches, are numerous glands of an ovoid shape; of a reddish hue in the infant, and subsequently brown and black, seated in the course of the bronchia. Their functions are unknown. The bronchial glands may be presumed to be affected by scrofulosis, when, in addition to the existence of tumours in the neck, percussion gives a dull sound under the upper and central part of the sternum, whilst there is no appreciable lesion of the lungs.

BRONCHIAL NERVES, (F.) Nerfs Bronchiques, are furnished by the two pulmonary plexuses.

BRONCHIAL PHTHISIS, see Phtthisis bronchial—b. Respiration, see Murmur, respiratory.

Inflammation des Bronches. Inflammation of the lining membrane of the bronchial tubes. This is always more or less present in cases of pulmonary catarrh; and is accompanied by cough, mucous expectoration, dyspnoea, and more or less uneasiness in breathing. The acute form is accompanied with all the signs of internal inflammation, and requires the employment of antiphlogistics followed by revulsives. The chronic form, Tussis senilis, Catar'rhus senilis, Rheuma catarrh'alē, Peripneumonia nothā (q. v.) Bronchorrhœa acutē, Winter cough, Chronic Catarrh, may be confounded with phthisis; from which it must be distinguished mainly by the absence of hectic fever and of the physical signs that are characteristic of the latter, as well as by the nature of the expectoration, which is generally mucous, although at times muco-purulent. When the expectoration is little or none, the bronchitis is said to be dry, dry catarrh, (F.) Catarrh Sec.

When bronchitis affects the smaller tubes, it is termed capillary bronchitis, bronchitis capilla'ris, broncho-cœli infantis'lis (?), and is often fatal to children.

Gokre, Goudre, Hypertrophie du Corps Thyroïde, Grosse Gorge, Gros Cou.* This is no rupture, but consists of an enlargement of the thyroid gland. It is common at the base of lofty mountains in every part of the world; and has been supposed to be owing to the drinking of snow-water, but it occurs where there is no snow. The tumour is sometimes very extensive. Iodine has great power over it, and will generally occasion its absorption, when the case has not been of such duration as to have ended in a cartilaginous condition.

BRONCHOCEPHALITIS, Pertussis.

It is of a pearly white; crystallizes in oblique prisms with a parallelogrammatic base; is very bitter, slightly acrid and styptic, and soluble in water, but more so in alcohol. BRUIT DE POT FÊLÉ, 'Sound of a cracked vessel.' This sound is heard on percussion, when a cavern in the lungs is filled with air, and has a narrow outlet.

BRUIT DE RACLEMENT, 'Sound of scraping.' A sound produced by the scraping of hard, solid membranes, as the pericardium, against each other.

BRUIT DE RAPE, 'Sound of a rasp.' A sound heard during the contraction of either the auricles or ventricles. It is constant; and the contraction of the cavity is more prolonged than natural, and emits a hard, rough, and—as it were—stified sound.

It indicates contraction of the valvular orifices by cartilaginous deposits, or ossification, and is better heard near the apex of the heart, if the auriculo-ventricular valves be concerned,—near the base if the semilunar valves be the seat of the disease.

BRUIT ROTATOIRE, Bruit musculaire.

BRUIT DE SOUFFLET, Bruit de Souffle, 'bellows' sound,' 'blowing sound.' A sound like that of a bellows, heard occasionally by the ear applied to the chest during the contraction of the ventricles, auricles, or large arteries. It coexists with affections of the heart, but is heard, also, without any disease in that organ,—whenever, indeed, an artery is compressed.

An encephalic bellows' sound, has been described by Drs. Fisher and Whitney. It is heard on applying the ear to the occiput or to the top of the head; and is considered to indicate turgescence of vessels, or inflammation. When such turgescence exists, the vessels are compressed, and the compression gives rise to the sound in question.

BRUIT DE SOUFFLET PLACENTAIRE, Bruit placentaire—b. de Tiraillement, Bruit de craquement.

BRUIT DE TAFFETAS. 'Sound of Taffeta.' 'Sarcenet sound.' A respiratory sound so named, by M. Grisolles, from its resembling the sound caused by the tearing of a piece of taffeta; and which he considers to indicate hepatisation of the lung limited to the surface in pneumonia.

BRUIT UTRIN, B. placentaire.

BRULURE, Burn.

favouring transpiration. Westring, a Swedish physician, has recommended metallic brushes for the purpose of conveying galvanism to a part. These brushes consist of a plate of ebony fitted to another of gold, in which threads of the same metal are fixed;—the brush being connected with one of the poles of the galvanic pile.

Concretions, which form in the ligaments, and within the capsules of the joints, in persons affected with gout. of the bile. Biliary calculi are most frequently found in the gall-bladder: at other times, in the substance of the liver, in the branches of the Ductus hepaticus, or in the Ductus Communis Choledochus. The first are called Cystic; the second Hepatic; and the last, sometimes, Hepato-cystic. The causes which give rise to them are very obscure. Often they occasion no uneasiness, and at other times the symptoms may be confounded with those of hepatitis. At times, they are rejected by the mouth, or by the bowels, along with a considerable quantity of bile, which had accumulated behind them; at other times, they occasion violent abdominal inflammation, abscesses, and biliary fistule, rupture of the gall-bladder, and fatal effusion into the peritoneum. The passage of a gall-stone is extremely painful; yet the pulse is not at first affected: Antiphlogistics, when there is inflammatory action, and strong doses of opium, to allay the pain and spasm, with the warm bath, are the chief remedies. Solvents are not to be depended upon. They cannot reach the calculi.

CALCULI, IN THE EARS, (F.) Calculi de l'Oreille. Hard, light, and inflammable concretions, which occur in the meatus auditorius externus, and are merely indurated ceramen. CALCULI FELLEI, Calculi, biliary.

CALCULI, LACHRYMAL, (F.) Calculi lacrymanz. Concretions, sometimes, but rarely, form in the lachrymal passages, where they occasion abscesses and fistule, which do not heal until they are extracted. No analysis has been made of them.

CALCULI OF THE MAMMÆ, (F.) Calculi des Mamelles. Haller gives a case of a concretion, of a yellowish-white colour, which had the shape of one of the excretory ducts of the mammary gland, having been extracted from an abscess seated in that organ.

CALCULI OF THE PANCREAS, (F.) Calculi du Pancréas. These are but little known. Analogy has induced a belief that they resemble the salivary. Some have supposed that certain transparent calculi, rejected by vomiting, or passed in the evacuations, have proceeded from the pancreas, but there seems to be no reason for this belief.

CALCULI OF THE PINEAL GLAND, (F.) Calculi de la Glande Pinale. These have been frequently met with. No symptom announces their presence during life. They are composed of phosphate of lime.

CALCULI OF THE PROSTATE, Prostatie calculi. These are not very rare. They have generally the same composition as the preceding. They usually present the symptoms common to every tumefaction of the prostate, and sometimes those of calculi in the bladder.

CALCULI PULMONARY, (F.) Calculi pulmonaires. These concretions are very frequently met with in the dead body, without seeming to have produced unpleasant symptoms during life. At other times, they are accompanied with all the symptoms of phthisis, Phthisis calculense, of Bayle. At times, they are expectorated without the intervention of any unpleasant symptom. They are usually formed of carbonate of lime and animal matter.

CALCULI, SALIVARY, Calculi salivales, Sialolithi, (F.) Calculi salivares. Concretions, usually formed of phosphate of lime and animal matter, which are developed in the substance of the salivary glands or in their excretory ducts. In the first case, they may be mistaken for a simple swelling of the gland; in the second, they may be generally detected by the touch. They may be extracted by incision in the interior of the mouth. The calculus developed in the sublingual ducts has been called Calculus sublingualis, and Ranula lapidea.

CALCULI, SPERMATIC, (F.) Calculi spermaticus. These have been sometimes found in the vesiculæ seminales after death. They cannot be detected during life. No analysis has been made of them.

CALCULI OF THE STOMACH AND INTESTINES, Entero-lithus, E. Calculus, Copro-lithus, Concretiones alvina, (F.) Calculi de l'estomac, C. intestinalis, Pierres stercorales, Concretions intestinales. Calculi of the stomach are rare, and have almost always been carried thither by the antiperistaltic action of the intestines. The symptoms occasioned by them are those of chronic gastritis. It has been imagined that the continued use of absorbent powders, as magnesia, will give occasion to them.

Intestinal concretions, (F.) Calculi intestinalis, are not uncommon in animals (see BOARD); but they are rare in man. The causes which give rise to them are little known: sometimes a biliary calculus affords them a nucleus. Their composition varies. They are light, hard, very fetid, and not inflammable. They are formed, ordinarily, between the valves of the small intestines, or in the cells of the large, and sometimes in old hernias. Whilst they do not obstruct the passage of the alimentary mass, they produce no unpleasant symptom. At times, the movable tumour which they form, may be felt through the parietes of the abdomen. They are generally evacuated per anum.

CALCULI OF THE TONSILS. Calculous concretions, which sometimes form in the tonsils. (F.) Calculi des Amygdales. They are easily recognised by the sight and touch: sometimes they are discharged by spitting, either alone or with the pus of an abscess occasioned by their presence. They have not been analyzed.

CALCULI, URINARY, Urolithi, (F.) Calculi urinares, Pierres urinaires. Concretions, which form from the crystallizable substances in the urine, and which are met with not only in the whole course of the urinary passages, but in fistulous openings wherever the urine stagnates naturally or accidentally. Their causes are but little known. They are more common at the two extremities of life than at the middle, and more so in some countries and districts than in others. At times, a clot of blood, a portion of mucus, &c., will form the nucleus. The symptoms and treatment vary according to the seat of the calculus. There is no such thing probably as a medical solvent. See Urinary Calculi.

Modern chymists have demonstrated the existence of several components of urinary calculi, viz. Lithic Acid, Phosphate of Lime, Ammoniac-Magnesian Phosphate, Oxalate of

Lime, Cystic Oxide, and Xanthic Oxide, with an animal cementing ingredient. The varieties of calculi, produced by the combination or intermixture of these ingredients, are thus represented by Dr. Paris.

A TABULAR VIEW OF THE DIFFERENT SPECIES OF URINARY CALCULI.

SPECIES OF CALCULI.	EXTERNAL CHARACTERS.	CHEMICAL COMPOSITION.	REMARKS.
1. LITHIC OR URIC.	Form, a flattened oval. S. G. generally exceeds 1.500. Colour, brownish or fawn-like. Surface, smooth. Texture, laminated.	It consists principally of Lithic Acid . When treated with nitric acid, a beautiful pink substance results. This calculus is slightly soluble in water, abundantly so in the pure alkalies.	It is the prevailing species; but the surface sometimes occurs finely tuberculated. It frequently constitutes the nuclei of the other species.
2. MULBERRY.	Colour, dark brown. Texture, harder than that of the other species. S. G. from 1.428 to 1.976. Surface, studded with tubercles.	It is oxalate of lime , and is decomposed in the flame of a spirit lamp, swelling out into a white efflorescence, which is quicklime .	This species includes some varieties, which are remarkably smooth and pale-coloured, resembling leap red .
3. BONE MARTH.	Colour, pale brown or gray; surface, smooth and polished; structure regularly laminated; the laminae easily separating into concrete crusts.	Principally phosphate of lime . It is soluble in muriatic acid.
4. TRIPLE.	Colour, generally brilliant white. Surface, uneven, studded with shining crystals, less compact than the preceding species. Between its laminae small cells occur, filled with sparkling particles.	It is an ammonio-magnesian phosphate , generally mixed with phosphate of lime. Pure alkalies decompose it, extracting its ammonia.	This species attains a larger size than any of the others.
5. FUSIBLE.	Colour. Grayish white.	A compound of the two foregoing species.	It is very fusible, melting into a vitreous globule.
6. CYSTIC.	Very like the triple calculus, but it is unstratified and more compact and homogeneous.	It consists of cystic oxide . Under the blowpipe it yields a peculiarly fetid odour. It is soluble in acids, and in alkalies, even if they are fully saturated with carbonic acid.	It is a rare species.
7. ALTERNATING.	Its section exhibits different concentric laminae.	Compounded of several species, alternating with each other.
8. COMPOUND.	No characteristic form.	The ingredients are separable only by chymical analysis.

1. Renal Calculi, (F.) Calculi renaux. These have almost always a very irregular shape: at times, there will be no indication of their presence: at others, they occasion attacks of pain in the kidneys, sometimes accompanied with bloody or turbid urine. Often, they cause inflammation of the kidneys, with all its unpleasant results. They are generally formed of uric acid, animal matter, and oxalate of lime, with, sometimes, phosphates. The treatment will have to vary, according to the absence or presence of inflammatory signs,—relieving the irritation by opiates. A surgical operation can rarely be applicable.

2. Calculi in the Ureters, (F.) Calculi des Urètres. These come from the kidneys, and do not produce unpleasant effects, unless they are so large as to obstruct the course of the urine, and to occasion distention of the whole of the ureter above them; or unless their surface is so rough as to irritate the mucous membrane, and occasion pain, hemorrhage, abscesses, &c. The pain, during the passage, is sometimes very violent, extending to the testicle of the same side in the male; and occasioning a numbness of the thigh in both sexes. The treatment consists in general or local blood-letting, warm bath, and opiates.

3. Calculi, Vesical; Stones in the Bladder, Lithia Vesicalis, Lithi'asis cystica, Lithi'asis vesicalis, Cysto-lithi'asis, Dysuria calculosa, D. irritata, Calculus vesicæ, (F.) Calculi vesicaux. These are the most common. Sometimes, they proceed from the kidneys: most commonly, they are formed in the bladder itself. Sense of weight in the perinæum, and sometimes of a body rolling when the patient changes his position; pain or itching at the extremity of the glans in men; frequent desire to pass the urine; sudden stoppage to its flow; and bloody urine—are the chief signs which induce us to suspect their existence. We cannot, however, be certain of this without sounding the patient. Sometimes, when of a small size, they are expelled: most commonly, they remain in the bladder, the disorganisation of which they occasion, unless removed by a surgical operation.

4. Calculi Uréthral. They almost always proceed from the bladder. The obstruction, which they cause to the passage of the urine, the hard tumour, and the noise occasioned when struck by a sound, indicate their presence. They are removed by incision.

5. Calculi in Fistulous passages. These arise when there is some fistulous opening into the urethra. They can be readily recognised, and may generally be extracted with facility. (F.) Calculi placés hors des voies urinaires. See Urinary Calculi.

CALCULI OF THE UTERUS, (F.) Calculi de l'Utérus. These are very rare. The signs, which indicate them during life, are those of chronic engorgement of the uterus. Their existence, consequently, cannot be proved till after death.

CALCULUS, Lapis, Lithos, λίθος. A diminutive of calcis, a lime-stone. (F.) Calcul, Pierre. Calculi are concretions, which may form in every part of the animal body, but which are most frequently found in the organs that act as reservoirs, and in the excretory canals. They are met with in the tonsils, joints, biliary ducts, digestive passages, lachrymal ducts, mammae, pancreas, pineal gland, prostate, lungs, salivary, spermatic and urinary passages, and in the uterus. The causes which give rise to them are obscure.

Those that occur in reservoirs or ducts are supposed to be owing to the deposition of the substances, which compose them, from the fluid as it passes along the duct; and those which occur in the substance of an organ are regarded as the product of some chronic irritation. Their general effect is to irritate, as extraneous bodies, the parts with which they are in contact; and to produce retention of the fluid, whence they have been formed. The symptoms differ, according to the sensibility of the organ and the importance of the particular secretion whose discharge they impede. Their solution is generally impracticable: spontaneous expulsion or extraction is the only way of getting rid of them.

CANCELLE, 'Lattice-work.' The Cellular or Spongy Texture of Bones, (F.) Tissu cellulaire; consisting of numerous cells, communicating with each other. They contain a fatty matter, analogous to marrow. This texture is met with, principally, at the extremities of long bones; and some of the short bones consist almost wholly of it. It allows of the expansion of the extremities of bones, without adding to their weight; and deadens concussions.

CANCELUS, from cancer, 'a crab.' A species of crayfish, called the Wrong Hair, and Bernard the Hermit: which is said to cure rheumatism, if rubbed on the part.

CANCER, 'a crab.' (q. v.) Car'cinus, Lupus cancro'sus, Ulcus cancro'sum. A disease, so called either on account of the hideous appearance which the ulcerated cancer presents, or on account of the great veins which surround it, and which the ancients compared to the claws of the crab: called also Car'cino'ma. It consists of a scirrhus, livid tumour, intersected by firm, whitish, divergent bands; and occurs chiefly in the secretory glands. The pains are acute and lancinating, and often extend to other parts. The tumour, ultimately, terminates in a fetid and ichorous ulcer. It is distinguished, according to its stages, into occuli and open; the former being the scirrhus, the latter the ulcerated condition. At times, there is a simple destruction or erosion of the organs, at others, an encephaloid or cerebriform, and at others, again, a colloid degeneration.

For its production, it requires a peculiar diathesis, or cachexia. The following table, from Dr. Walshe, exhibits the characters of the three species of carcinoma:

The use of irritants in cancerous affections, is strongly to be deprecated. When the disease is so situated that excision can be practised, the sooner it is removed the better.

Encephaloid.	Scirrhus.	Colloid.
Resembles lobulated cerebral matter. Is commonly opaque from its earliest formation. Is of a dead white colour. Contains a multitude of minute vessels. Is less hard and dense than scirrhus.	Resembles rind of bacon traversed by cellulo-fibrous septa. Has a semitransparent glossiness. Has a clear whitish or bluish yellow tint. Is comparatively ill-supplied with vessels. Is exceedingly firm and dense.	Has the appearance of particles of jelly imbedded in a regular alveolar bed. The contained matter is strikingly transparent Greenish yellow is its predominant hue. Its vessels have not been sufficiently examined as yet. The jelly-like matter is exceedingly soft; a cold mass is, however, firm and resisting.
Is frequently found in the veins issuing from the diseased mass. The predominant microscopical elements are globular, not always distinctly cellular, and caudate corpuscula.	Has not been distinctly detected in this situation. The main microscopical constituents are juxtaposed nuclear cells; caudate corpuscula do not exist in this situation.	The pulsatious variety has been detected in the veins. Is composed of shells in a state of embettlement.
Occasionally attains an enormous bulk. Has been observed in almost every tissue of the body.	Rarely acquires larger dimensions than an orange. Its seat, as ascertained by observation, is somewhat more limited. Is not unusually solitary.	Observes a mean in this respect. Has so far been seen in a limited number of parts only.
Very commonly co-exists in several parts or organs of the same subject. Is remarkable for its occasional vast rapidity of growth.	Ordinarily grows slowly.	Has rarely been met with in more than one organ. Grows with a medium degree of rapidity.
Is frequently the seat of interstitial hemorrhage and deposition of black or bistre-coloured matter.	Is comparatively rarely the seat of these changes.	Undergoes no visible change of the kind.
When softened into a pulp, appears as a dead white or pink opaque matter of creamy consistence.	Resembles, when softened, a yellowish brown semitransparent gelatinous matter.
Subcutaneous tumours are slow to contract adhesion with the skin. Ulcerated encephaloid is frequently the seat of hemorrhage, followed by rapid fungous development.	Scirrhus thus situate usually becomes adherent. Scirrhus ulcers much less frequently give rise to hemorrhage; an fungous growths (provided they retain the scirrhus character) are now more slowly and less abundantly developed.
The progress of the disease after ulceration is commonly very rapid.	There is not such a remarkable change in the rate of progress of the disease after ulceration has set in.
It is the most common form under which secondary cancer exhibits itself.
Is the species of cancer most frequently observed in young subjects.	Is much less common before puberty.	Has so far been observed in adults only.

A deprivation of sight, which comes on, as if a veil fell before the eyes. Cataract consists in opacity of the crystalline lens or its capsule, which prevents the passage of the rays of light, and precludes vision. The causes are obscure. Diagnosis.—The patient is blind, the pupil seems closed by an opaque body, of variable colour, but commonly whitish:—the pupil contracting and dilating. Cataracts have been divided, by some, into spurious and genuine. The former, where the obstacle to vision is between the capsule of the lens and the uvea: the latter, where it is in the lens or capsule. A lenticular cataract is where the affection is seated in the lens;—a capsular or membranous in the capsule. The capsular is divided again, by Beer, into the anterior, posterior, and complete capsular cataract. When the capsule is rendered opaque, in consequence of an injury, which cuts or ruptures any part of it, it thickens, becomes leathery, and has been called Cataract'a ar'da siliquo'sa. Cataract'a Morgagnia'na lactea vel puriformis, is the milky variety, in which the crystalline is transformed into a liquid similar to milk, (F.) Cataracts lacteusa; or, as generally defined, in which there is opacity of the fluid situate between the lens and its capsule. The capsulo-lenticularis affects both lens and capsule, and Beer conceives the liquor Morgagni, in an altered state, may contribute to it. Cataracts are also called stony, (F.) (pierreuse), milky or cheesy, (laitouse ou caéuse, Galactocataracta, Cataracta lacticolor), according to their density:—white, pearly, yellow, brown, gray, green, black, (F.) blanche, perlée, jaune, brune, grise, verte, noire, according to their colour:—fixed or vacillating,—cataracta capsulo-lenticularis fixa vel trémula, (F.) fixe ou branlante, according as they are fixed or movable behind the pupil. They are likewise called Cataracta marmorata, fenestrata, stellata, punctata, dimidiata, &c., according to the appearances they present.

They may also be simple, or complicated with adhesion, amaurosis, specks, &c.; and primary or primitive, when opaque before the operation;—secondary, when the opacity is the result of the operation.

Cataract is commonly a disease of elderly individuals, although, not unfrequently, congenital. It forms slowly; objects are at first seen as through a mist; light bodies appear to fly before the eyes, and it is not until after months or years that the sight is wholly lost. No means will obviate the evil except an operation, which consists in removing the obstacle to the passage of the light to the retina. Four chief methods are employed for this purpose. 1. Couching or Depression, Hyalonizis, Hyalonizis, (F.) Abaissement, Déplacement de la Cataracta. This consists in passing a cataract needle through the sclerotica and subjacent membranes, a little above the transverse diameter of the eye; and at about two lines' distance from the circumference of the transparent cornea, until the point arrives in the posterior chamber of the eye. With this the crystalline is depressed to the outer and lower part of the globe of the eye, where it is left. 2. By absorption,—by the French termed broiement, or bruising. This is performed in the same manner as the former; except that, instead of turning the crystalline from the axis of the visual rays, it is divided by the cutting edge of the needle, and its fragments are scattered in the humours of the eye, where they are absorbed. 3. By extraction, which consists in opening, with a particular kind of knife, the transparent cornea and the anterior portion of the capsule of the crystalline; and causing the lens to issue through the aperture. Each of the processes has its advantages and disadvantages, and all are used by surgeons. 4. Some, again, pass a cataract needle through the transparent cornea and pupil to the crystalline, and depress or cause its absorption. This is called Keratonyxis, which see.

CATARRH', Catar'rhus, Catar'rhopus, Catarrheuma, Rheuma, Defluxio, Catastagma, Phlegmatorrhag'ia, Phlegmatorrhoea, from ρηναι, 'downwards,' and ρηνω, 'I flow.' A discharge of fluid from a mucous membrane. The ancients considered catarrh as a simple flux, and not as an inflammation. Generally it partakes of this character, however. Catarrh is, with us, usually restricted to inflammation of the mucous membrane of the air-passages: the French extend it to that of all mucous membranes. (F.) Flux muqueus, Fluxion catarrhale.

It is commonly an affection of but little consequence, but apt to relapse and become chronic. It is characterized by cough, thirst, lassitude, fever, watery eyes, with increased secretion of mucus from the air-passages. The antiphlogistic regimen and time usually remove it.—Sometimes, the inflammation of the bronchial tubes is so great as to prove fatal.

CATOPTRIC EXAMINATION OF THE EYE. When a lighted candle is held before the eye, three images of it are seen—two erect, and one inverted;—the former owing to reflection from the cornea and anterior surface of the crystalline; the latter owing to reflection from the posterior layer of the crystalline. This mode of examining the eye has been proposed as a means of diagnosis between cataract and amaurosis. In the latter, all the images are seen.

A substance, used for 'firing,' burning or disorganizing the parts to which it is applied. Cauteries were divided by the ancients into actual and potential. The word is now restricted to the red-hot iron; or to positive burning. It was, formerly, much used for preventing hemorrhage from divided arteries; and also with the same views as a blister. The term Potentillæ Caustery, Cauterium potentillæ, Ignis potentillæ, (F.) Feu potentillæ, was generally applied to the causticum commune, (q. v.) but it is now used synonymally with caustic in general.

Cautère also means an issue.

CAUTERIUM ACTUALE, Cauterium.

CAUTERIZATION, Cauterisatio, Cauteriasmus, Ecaustio, Inustio, Cautistica Adustio. Firing. The effect of a cautery. The French, amongst whom cauterization is much used, distinguish five kinds: 1. Cauterisation Inhérente, which consists in applying the actual cautery freely, and with a certain degree of force, so as to disorganize deeply. 2. Cauterisation transcurrente, which consists in passing the edge of the Cautère cutellaire, or the point of the Cautère conique lightly, so as not to disorganize deeply. 3. Cauterisation par pointes, which consists in applying on the skin, here and there, the hot point of the conical cautery, with sufficient force to cauterize the whole thickness of the skin. 4. Cauterisation lente, slow cauterization, by means of the moxa. 5. Cauterisation objective, which consists in holding the cautery at some distance from the part to be acted upon by it.

The vena cava superior, thoracica vel descendens, is formed by the union of the subclavians; and receives successively, before its termination at the upper part of the right auricle, the inferior thyroid, right internal mammary, superior diaphragmatic, azygos, &c. The vena cava inferior, abdominalis vel ascendens, arises from the union of the two primary iliacs, opposite the fourth or fifth lumbar vertebra, receives the middle sacral, lumbar, right spermatic, hepatic, and inferior diaphragmatic, and opens at the posterior and inferior part of the right auricle.

CAVERNOUS BODIES, Corpora Cavernosa of the penis, Corpora nervosa, C. Nervos-spongiosa Penis, (F.) Corps Cavernoux. The corpus cavernosum is a kind of cylindrical sac, separated, through its whole extent, by a vertical, incomplete septum; and forming nearly two-thirds of the penis. The corpus cavernosum, on each side, arises from the ascending portion of the ischium, and terminates obtusely behind the glans. The arteries of the corpora cavernosa come from the internal pudic. See Helicine Arteries. Nerves are found on the surface of the outer membrane, but they do not appear to penetrate the substance.

J. Müller's researches have led him to infer, that both in man and the horse, the nerves of the corpora cavernosa are made up of branches proceeding from the organic as well as the animal system, whilst the nerves of animal life alone provide the nerves of sensation of the penis.

CAVERNOUS BODIES, Corpora Cavernosa of the Clitoris, are two hollow crura, forming the clitoris.

CAVERNOUS BODY OF THE VAGINA, Corpus Cavernosum Vaginae, Plexus retiformis, is a substance, composed of blood-vessels and cells, similar to those of the penis and clitoris, which covers the outer extremity of the vagina, on each side. It serves to contract the entrance to the vagina during coition.

CAVERNOUS RESPIRATION, (F.) When a cavity exists in the lungs, and one or more ramifications of the bronchia terminate in it, a loud tubal noise is emitted, provided the cavity be not filled with fluid, which is called cavernous respiration. In this condition the cough is cavernous likewise. (F.) Toux Cavernouse. When the capacity of the cavern is very great, the sound of respiration is like that produced by blowing into a decanter, with the mouth at a little distance from the neck. This kind of cavernous respiration has been called amphoric, from amphora, 'a flask;' (F.) Respiration amphorique, Souffle amphorique, S. métallique.

The Veiled Puff, (F.) Souffle voilé, is a modification of the cavernous respiration, in which, according to Laënnec, "a sort of movable veil interposed between the excavation and the ear" seems to be agitated to and fro. It is a sign which is not attended to.

The Cavernous Sinuses are venous cavities of the dura mater, filled with a multitude of reddish, soft filaments, intersecting each other; and, as it were, reticulated. They commence behind the inner part of the sphenoid fissure, pass backwards on the sides of the fossa pituitaria, and terminate by opening into a cavity, common to the superior and inferior petrosal sinuses. They receive some meningeal veins, the ophthalmic veins, &c. The anterior extremity of each cavernous sinus has been named the ophthalmic sinus.

CAVERNOUS TEXTURE or TISSUE, (F.) Tissu cavernoux. The spongy substance which forms the greater part of the penis and clitoris. It seems to consist of a very complicated lace-work of arteries and veins; and, probably, of nervous filaments, with small fibrous plates, which form by their decussation numerous cells communicating with each other. This spongy texture produces erection, by dilating and swelling on the influx of blood; and probably, also, by virtue of some property inherent in it.

Anatomists do not agree regarding its intimate structure. It seems to contain cellulæ or irregular areolæ between the fibres and plates; as well as serum, fat, and the adipous tissue. The cellular tissue or texture unites every part of the body; determines its shape, and by its elasticity and contractility, and by the fluid which it contains in its cells, facilitates the motion of parts on each other.

Cellular tissue has been divided by anatomists into the external, general or common cellular tissue—textus cellulæ, intermedius scularis, which does not penetrate the organs,—the cellular texture which forms the envelopes of organs—textus cellulæ strictus; and that which penetrates into the organs, accompanying and enveloping all their parts,—the textus cellulæ stipatus, constituting the basis of all the organs. CELOTOMIA, Kelotomia, Celotomy, from  $\kappa\eta\lambda\eta$ , 'a rupture,' and  $\tau\epsilon\mu\alpha\iota\varsigma$ , 'to cut.' An operation, formerly employed for the radical cure of inguinal hernia; which consisted, principally, in passing a ligature round the hernial sac and spermatic vessels. CEREBEL'LOUS, Cerebello'sus, from cerebellum, 'the little brain.' (F.) Cérébelleux. Chaussieur has given this epithet to the vessels of the cerebellum. These are three in number; two of which are inferior: the larger, inferior cerebelli, which arises from the posterior cerebral or vertebral; and the smaller, whose existence is not constant, from the mesocephalic or basiliary—the third, called, A. cérébelleux supérieure (superior cerebelli), is also a branch of the basiliary.

portion of the medullary mass, contained in the cavity of the cranium. It fills the lower occipital fossæ below the tentorium, and embraces the tuber annulare and medulla. It is composed, like the brain, of vesicular and medullary substance, arranged in laminae, as it were; so that, when a section is made of it, it has an arborescent appearance, called Arbor vitæ. The cerebellum is divided into two lobes or hemispheres or lateral masses, and each lobe is again subdivided into Monticuli or Lobules. In the cerebellum are to be observed the Crusa cerebelli, the fourth ventricle, the valvula magna cerebri, the processus vermiculares, superior and inferior, &c.

CEREBRAL ARTERIES are three on each side:—the anterior or artery of the corpus callosum, and the middle, arteria Sylviana, are furnished by the internal carotid;—the posterior or posterior and inferior artery of the brain, A. profunda cerebri, arises from the vertebral. Chaussier calls these arteries lobaires, because they correspond with the anterior, middle, and posterior lobes, whilst he calls the trunks, whence they originate, cerebral.

CEREBRAL NERVES are those which arise within the cranium, all of which, perhaps, with the exception of the olfactory, originate from the medulla oblongata. See Nerves.

In Pathology, an affection is called cerebral, which specially occupies the brain. Fievre cérébrale, Cerebral fever, is a variety in which the head is much affected.

CEREBRUM or CEREBRUM. The brain.

(F.) Cereveau, Cerevella. This term is sometimes applied to the whole of the contents of the cranium: at others to the upper portion;—the posterior and inferior being called cerebellum. The brain, properly so called, extends from the os frontis to the superior occipital fossæ. Anteriorly, it rests on the orbital vaults: behind this, on the middle fossæ of the base of the cranium; and, posteriorly, on the tentorium cerebelli super-externum. The upper surface is divided by a deep median cleft (Scissura interlobaire,—Ch.) into two halves, called hemispheres, which are united at the base by the corpus callosum. At its surface are numerous convolutions. The inferior surface exhibits, from before to behind, three lobes, distinguished into anterior, middle, and posterior. The middle is separated from the anterior by the fissure of SYLVIVS; and from the posterior, by a shallow furrow which corresponds to the upper portion of the pars petrosa. Internally, the brain has, on the median line, the corpus callosum, septum lucidum, forma. pineal gland, and third ventricle:—and laterally, the lateral ventricles, in which are the corpora striata, optic thalami, &c. It is contained in a triple envelope, (see Meninges.) Its texture is pulpy, and varies according to age. Two substances may be distinguished in it—the white, medullary or fibrous—medulla cerebri, and the cortical, granititious, vesicular, or gray. The former is white; and occupies all the interior and base of the brain. The latter is grayish and softer. It is situate particularly at the surface of the organ.

The brain receives several arterial vessels, furnished by the internal carotid and vertebral. Its veins end in the sinuses. It is the material organ of the mental and moral manifestations. According to Gall, each part is the special seat of one of those faculties, and the brain and cerebellum, inclusive, are called by him "the nervous system of the mental faculties." The following table, from Haller and Cuvier, exhibits the proportion between the mass of the brain and that of the body in man and in animals.

A cutaneous affection, characterized by one or more broad irregular-shaped patches, of a yellow or yellowish-brown colour, and occurring most frequently on the front of the neck, breast, abdomen, groins, &c. The patches do not generally rise above the surface. There is usually some degree of itching.

The causes are not very evident. Sulphur externally—in any and every form—generally removes it speedily. Should there be difficulty, the external use of the remedy in baths or fumigations may succeed.

CHLORA, Chlorine.

CHLORAS KALICUS DEPURATUS, Potassæ murias hyperoxygenatus.

CHLORASMA, Chlorosis.

CHLORE, Chlorine—c. Liquida, see Chlorine.

CHLORETUM CALCARIÆ, Calciæ chloridum.

CHLORIASIS, Chlorosis.

CHLORINE, from  $\chi\lambda\omicron\sigma$ , 'green.' Chlorinum, Chlora, Oxy muriatic Acid Gas, Oxygenated Muriatic Acid Gas, Dehydrogenated Marine Acid, Halogenæ, Murigenæ, Chlorum, (F.) Chlore. So far as we know, this is an elementary substance. It is a greenish, yellow gas, of a strong suffocating smell, and disagreeable taste; incapable of maintaining combustion and respiration, and very soluble in water. One of its characteristics is, that of destroying, almost immediately, all vegetable and animal colours. It is employed in fumigations as a powerful disinfecting agent. A very dilute solution, Aqua seu Liquor chlorini, (F.) Chlore liquida, has been administered internally, in certain cases of diarrhœa and chronic dysentery. Immersion of the hands and arms in it has often removed itch and other cutaneous affections. It has also been inhaled in a dilute state in the early stage of phthisis, but it is of doubtful efficacy, and is better adapted for chronic bronchitis.

CHLOROFORM, Perchloride of Formyl, called, also, Tetrachloride of Carbon, and Chloric ether, Ether chloricus, (F.) Chlorure de Carbon, so called on account of the connexion of chlorine with formic acid, is a colourless oleaginous liquid, of a sweetish ethereal odour, hot, aromatic, and peculiar taste, and of the specific gravity 1.480. It may be obtained by distilling from a mixture of chlorinated lime and alcohol,—rectifying the product by re-distillation, first from a great excess of chlorinated lime, and afterwards from strong sulphuric acid. It has been used with advantage in asthma, and in diseases in which a grateful soothing agent is required. Dose, f. ℥ss to f. ℥j. diluted with water. It has likewise been prescribed with great success as an anæsthetic agent in spasmodic diseases; and to obtund sensibility in surgical operations and in parturition,—especially in the way of inhalation; but its use requires caution.

CHLOROPHYLLE, Fecula, green.

CHLOROSIS, from  $\chi\lambda\omicron\sigma$ , 'green,' Pallidus Morbus, Fædus Virginitum color, Pallidus color virginæus, Ictericæ alba, Icterus albus, Leucopathiæa, Morbus virginæus, Morbus Partheniæus, Dyspepsiæ chlorotica, Febris amatoria, Cachexiæ virginitum, Febris virginitum, Febris alba, Anepithymiæ chlorotica, Chlorasma, Chloriæsis, Citro-sis, Green-sickness, (F.) Chlorose, Pâles-couleurs. A disease which affects young females, more particularly those who have not menstruated. It is characterized by a pale, lurid complexion, languor, listlessness, depraved appetite and digestion, palpitation, &c. The disease generally goes off on the occurrence of the menstrual flux; but sometimes it is long before this is established, and at times, the catamenia are in much larger quantity than usual. To this last form M. Trousseau has given the name chlorose hémorrhagique.

The blood of chlorosis is generally thin, light-coloured, and deficient in red corpuscles; and the clot is in less proportion to the serum than in health. On auscultation, a bellows' sound has been almost invariably detected over the heart, and a continuous blowing sound in the larger arteries, (especially the carotids and subclavians,) re-enforced by each systole of the ventricle, and resembling the buzzing of a humming-top, the cooing of doves, the whistling of air through a key-hole, &c., (See Bruit.) Very similar sounds are heard in the arteries after copious hæmorrhage: they seem, therefore, to coincide with enfeebled circulation.

Tonics—as iron—are usually required in the treatment,—the disease most commonly occurring in those in whom there is considerable torpor of the system.

CHLOROSIS ÆTHIOPUM Chthonophagiæ—c. Amatoria, Hectic fever—c. Giganteæ, see Poly-sarcia.

A disease characterized by anxiety, gripings, spasms in the legs and arms, and by vomiting and purging (generally bilious:) vomiting and purging are, indeed, the essential symptoms. The disease is most common in hot climates,—and in temperate climates, during summer. In India, Spasmodic cholera, Asiatic cholera, Malignant ch., Indian cholera, Epidemic ch., Pestilential ch., Asphyxia pestilentialis, Pestilential asphyxia, Choleric Pestilence, Eastern ch., Oriental ch., Cholera orientalis, *Ch. In temperate climates, common cholera is not usually a disease of much consequence. It requires that the stomach and bowels should be cleared, and afterwards the irritation be allayed by full doses of opium. In the malignant cholera of India, bleeding at the outset, without regard to the signs of apparent depression, and large doses of calomel, with opiates, form the great reliance of the practitioner.

CHOLERA INFANTUM, Chol'eric Fever of Infants; Cholera of Infants. A disease so termed by American physicians. It occurs, generally, in the middle states of the Union, in June or July, and continues during the hot weather, hence called the 'summer complaint.' The chief symptoms are vomiting, purging of green or yellow matter, slime or blood, attended with pain or uneasiness; and swelling of the abdomen, with some pyrexia, generally. The heat of the weather seems to be the predisposing, if not the exciting, cause. It is a fatal disease in towns; differing little, if at all, from what is vulgarly called the Watery Gripes in England. Clearing, gently, the alimentary canal, so as to remove the offending matter, and then exhibiting chalk mixture and laudanum, with counter-irritants, as sinapisms to the abdomen, is the most satisfactory plan of treatment.

It is of a whitish appearance; is separated from the chyme in the duodenum, and the rest of the small intestines: and is absorbed by the chyliiferous vessels, which arise at the mucous surface of the intestine. Along these it passes through the mesenteric glands to the thoracic duct, and is finally poured into the left subclavian. It is composed, like the blood, of a coagulable part and of serum. (F.) Chimie ou Chymie. A branch of the natural sciences, whose object is to investigate the principles of bodies;—to examine the properties enjoyed by the different compounds, produced by the union of those principles; and to study the force or power, by virtue of which every combination is effected. It investigates the action between the integrant molecules or atoms of bodies.

Organic Chemistry, Chymi'a organ'ica, Organochemi'a, is the chymistry of organized substances,—animal and vegetable.

Animal Chym'istry, Zoöch'emy or Zoöch'ymy, Zoöchemi'a, is the chymistry of substances afforded by the dead or living animal body. This branch of chymistry has been farther subdivided into physiological, when it considers the changes produced in animal substances by the action of life; pathological, when it regards those produced by organic or other diseases. Anthropochymy, Anthropochemi'a, is the chymistry of the human body. Chymistry is called Therapeutical or Pharmaceutic, Pharmaco-chymi'a, Chymi'a pharmaceutica, when it is engaged in the analysis of simple medicines; in improving the prescribing and preparing of chemical and Galenic medicines; in the means of preparing them, and detecting adulterations, &c. Hygienic Chym'istry is that which is applied to the means of rendering habitations healthy, of analyzing the air we breathe, preventing the occurrence of disease, pointing out healthy ailments, and appreciating the influence of professions, &c. on the health of man. All these different subdivisions, with vegetable chymistry, are, at times, included under the head of Medical Chym'istry: at others, the term comprehends only the Animal, Vegetable and Pharmaceutic subdivisions.

Vital Chemistry, Biochymi'a, is that which is executed under the influence of vitality.

A knowledge of chymistry is of great importance to the physician. Many of the functions are of a chemical nature: many diseases require a chemical mode of treatment; and, without an acquaintance with it, two or more substances might be given in combination, which, by forming a chemical union, might give rise to other compounds, possessing very different virtues from the components taken singly, and thus the prescriber be disappointed in the results.

Also, a peculiar sort of moving organs, resembling small hairs, Cilia vibrato'ria, (F.) Cils vibratils, which are visible with the microscope in many animals. These organs are found on parts of the body, which are habitually in contact with water, or other more or less fluid matters, and produce motion in these fluids, impelling them along the surface of the parts. Cilia have been found to exist in all vertebrated animals except fishes, having been discovered on the respiratory and uterine mucous membranes of mammalia, birds, and reptiles.

The terms "vibratory motion" and "ciliary motion" have been used to express the appearance produced by the moving cilia; and it is probable, that this motion is concerned in the progression of fluids along the membranes. As yet, the motion has been observed only in the direction of the outlets of canals.

CILIAIRE, Ciliary.

CIL'ARY, Cilia'ris, (F.) Ciliaire. Relating to the eyelashes, or to cilia. This epithet has, also, been applied to different parts, which enter into the structure of the eye; from the resemblance between some of them (the ciliary processes) and the eyelashes.

The anterior, Ar'teris cilia'res anteriores of Haller, the number of which is variable. These pierce the sclerotic a few lines from its union with the cornea; and are principally distributed to the iris.

It resembles the disk of a radiated flower, and is formed by the union of the ciliary processes.

A species of grayish ring, of a pulpy consistence, situate between the choroid, iris, and sclerotic. It seems to be nothing more than cellular tissue. The internal surface of the choroid is uniform, until it approaches within ten lines and a-half of the edge of the cornea; here a dentated line is observed, termed ora serrata. The outer surface presents the an'nulus al'bidus seu gangli'form'is, the anterior edge of which unites to the inner surface of the sclerotic and constitutes the ciliary ligament.

CILIARY VEINS, (F.) Veines ciliares, follow nearly the same course as the arteries. In the choroid they are so tortuous, that they have received the name Vasa vortico'sa. They open into the ophthalmic vein.

CILIARY ZONE, Zona seu Zo'nula Ciliaris, Membran'ula Coro'na Ciliaris. Under the corpus ciliare, the capsule of the vitreous humour sends off an external lamina, which accompanies the retina, and is inserted, with it, into the forepart of the capsule of the lens, a little before its anterior edge. This is the Zo'nula ciliaris, Zonula Zin'nii, Coro'na Ciliaris, Orb'culus Ciliaris. It is of a striated appearance and circular form, and assists in fixing the lens to the vitreous humour.

CILLEMENT, Nictation.

CILLO. A name given by some authors to those whose upper eyelid is perpetually tremulous;—a trembling, which in some cases is called Life's blood. "To have life's blood in the eye," in other words, is to have this affection. Vogel calls it Cillo'sis.

Its active principle is Cinchonia.

CINCHONÆ OBLONGIFO'LIÆ CORTEX, Cortex ruber, Cinchona officinalis cortex ruber, Red Bark, (F.) Quinquina rouge. Odour and taste the same as the pale, but more intense: in large flat pieces, solid, heavy, dry; fracture short and smooth; of a deep brownish-red colour. Although this variety of bark is assigned to the Cinchona oblongifolia by some, it would seem, that nothing is certainly known as to its source. Active principles, Cinchonia and Quinia.

The last three are the only official varieties in the Pharmacopœia of the United States.—There are many other varieties, however, which are genuine cinchona barks, and yet have not been considered worthy of an official position. The Edinburgh Pharmacopœia admits, indeed, Cinchona cinerea, Gray bark, Silves bark or Huancuco bark, which is obtained around Huancuco in Peru, and belongs to the class of pale barks. Amongst the genuine but inferior barks are those brought from the northern Atlantic ports of South America, which, in commerce, are variously called Carthagena, Maracaybo and Santa Martha barks.

All these barks are bitter, astringent, tonic, and eminently febrifuge. The yellow bark is at least equal to any of the others, although the red contains more active principle. The discovery of their active principles is one of the most important gifts of modern chemistry. Still, in pernicious intermittents, the bark, in substance, is often demanded. It is employed in every disease in which there is deficient tone, but in cases where the stomach is much debilitated, the powder had better be avoided in consequence of the woody fibre, which might disagree. Externally, it is used in enemata, gargles, &c., and in gangrenous ulcerations. When it excites nausea, an aromatic may be added to it; if purging, opium; if costiveness, rhubarb, &c. Dose, ʒss to ʒj or more.

ESSENTIAL SALT OF BARK, as it is called, is an extract prepared, by macerating the bruised substance of bark in cold water, and submitting the infusion to a very slow evaporation.

CIRCULATION, Circulatio, Cyclophoria, Periodus sanguinis, from circulus, 'a circle;' or rather, from circum, 'around,' and ferre, latum, 'to carry.' (F.) Circulation. Physiologists give this name to the motion of the blood through the different vessels of the body—sanguimotion;—to that function, by which the blood, setting out from the left ventricle of the heart, is distributed to every part of the body by the arteries;—proceeds into the veins, returns to the heart, enters the right auricle, and passes into the corresponding ventricle, which sends it into the pulmonary artery to be distributed to the lungs, whence it issues by the pulmonary veins, and passes into the left auricle. From this it is sent into the left ventricle, and is again distributed by means of the arteries.

CIRCULATION, CAPILLARY, C. des Parenchymes, is that which takes place in the capillary vessels; and is, in some measure, independent of the action of the heart. CLIFTON, CLIMATE OF. The vicinity of Clifton and of Bristol, England, appears to be the mildest and driest climate in the west of England; and, consequently, the best winter residence, in that part of the country, for invalids. It is, also, a favourable summer climate, and is surrounded by numerous places of agreeable resort, suited for those who may pass the season there.

CLIGNEMENT, Nictation, Scardamygmus.

CLIGNOTEMENT, Nictation.

CLIMA, Climate.

CLIMACTERIC, Climactericus, Climactericus, from κλιμακτηριος, 'a step.' (F.) Climactérique ou Climactérique. A word, which properly signifies 'by degrees.' It has been applied to certain times of life, regarded to be critical.

At present, the word Climacteric is chiefly applied to certain periods of life, at which great changes occur, independently of any numerical estimate of years. Such are the period of puberty in both sexes; that of the cessation of the menses in women, &c.

CLIMACTERIC YEARS, Annis Climactericis, are, according to some, all those in the life of man, which are multiples of the number 7, Septem- niads. Others have applied the term to years, resulting from the multiplication of 7 by an odd number. Some have admitted only three climacterics; others, again, have extended them to multiples of 9. Most, however, have considered the 63d year as the Grand Climacteric;—63 being the product of the multiplication of 7 by 9, and all have thought that the period of three, seven, or nine, which they respectively adopted, was necessary to the entire renewal of the body; so that there was, at these times, in the economy, none of the parts of which it had previously consisted. The climacteric years have also been called, (Anni) hebdomadici, scala' res, grada' ris, scan' siles, genethliaci, natali' ris, fata' les, crit' ici, decreto' ris, hero' ici, &c. All the notions on the subject are essentially allied to the doctrine of numbers of Pythagoras.

CLIMATE, Clima, Inclina'tio cali, (F.) Climat, Gr. κλιμα, 'a region.' In geography, the word climate is applied to a space on the terrestrial globe, comprised between two circles parallel to the equator, and arbitrarily measured according to the length of the days. In a hygienic point of view, we understand by climate, since Hippocrates, a country or region, which may differ from another in respect to season, qualities of the soil, heat of atmosphere, &c. Climate, indeed, embraces, in a general manner, all the physical circumstances belonging to each region,—circumstances which exert considerable influence on living beings. The dark complexion e. g., of the inhabitants of the torrid zone is easily distinguishable from the paleness of those of the frigid,—so are the diseases. They are all modified, more or less, by climate or locality. Hot climates predispose to abdominal complications in febrile affections, cold climates to thoracic, &c.

One of the most important considerations with regard to climates is their comparative fitness for the residence of invalids, and especially of those who are liable to, or suffering under catarrhal or consumptive affections. The great object, in such cases, is to select a climate which will admit of regular and daily exercise in the open air, so that the invalid may derive every advantage which this form of revulsion is capable of effecting. To an inhabitant of the northern and middle portions of the United States—and the same applies to Great Britain, France, and the northern parts of the old world—a more southern climate alone affords these advantages in an eminent degree. During the summer months, there are few, if any, diseases, which require a milder climate than that of the United States, or of the milder districts of Europe. The temperature of the winter months is, consequently, the most important object of attention. Equability of temperature is essential, inasmuch as all sudden changes interfere with the great desideratum—exercise in the open air. In the whole continent of North America the changes are very sudden and extensive. It is not uncommon for the range to be 40°, between two successive days. So far, therefore, as this applies, the American climate is not well adapted to the invalid. In the southern portions, however, of the Union, this objection is counterbalanced by many advantages.

The following tables exhibit the mean temperature of the year, and of the different seasons—with the mean temperature of the warmest and coldest months at different places in America, Europe, Africa, &c., as deduced from the excellent paper of Von Humboldt on Isothermal Lines, the Meteorological Registers kept by the surgeons of the United States army, the work of Sir James Clark on Climate, &c.

Certain of the tables show the mean monthly temperature, maximum, minimum, and range, as well as the greatest daily, and mean daily range during the corresponding months—but of different years—at some of the prominent retreats for the valetudinarian in Great Britain, on the continent of Europe, and in the African islands. It is proper, however, to remark, that in no situations, except in those to which an asterisk is affixed, was the register thermometer used. In the others, the observations were made during the day only, and consequently the numbers given are far below the real range throughout the twenty-four hours. The places are ranged in the order of their mean tempera-

In the United States, the most favourable region for the phthisical invalid is that of Florida,—especially of Pensacola. St. Augustine is frequently chosen, but it is liable to north-east storms, which interfere with the out-door movements of the valetudinarian, and are the source of much discomfort. Still, great benefit has often been derived from it as a winter retreat. Of the Atlantic Isles, Madeira appears to be best adapted for the consumptive, and those affected with chronic bronchitis. In Italy, Rome, and Pisa,—and in England, Torquay and Undercliff, are to be preferred. Chronic rheumatism and gout are benefited by a warm climate, which, again, is unfavourable to those who are predisposed to cerebral diseases, especially to diseases that are characterized by debility and mobility of the nervous system—as paralysis, epilepsy, mania, &c. Hypochondriasis and dyspepsia require rather change of climate and travelling exercise than a sojourn in any one. (See the Author's Human Health, Philad. 1844.)

For the mortality of different countries and cities, see Mortality.

CLIMATERIC, Climacteric.

CLIMATIC, Climaticus. Belonging to, or dependent upon climate.

CLIMATIC DISEASES, Morbî climatici, are such as are caused by climate.

CLINE, κλίνη, 'a bed.' Hence:

CLINIATER, Clinical physician.

CLINIATRIA, Clinical medicine.

CLINIATRUS, Clinical physician.

CLINICA, Clinical medicine.

CLINICAL, Clinicus, (F.) Clinique. Relating to a bed.

CLINICAL LECTURE, (F.) Leçon Clinique.

CLINICAL PHYSICIAN, Cliniátor, Cliniátrus. One who teaches clinical medicine.

CLINICE, Clinical medicine.

CLINICUM, Clinique.

CLINIQUE, Clinical. Clinique, Clinicum, is also occasionally used substantively, for École Clinique or Clinical School: a school in which medicine is taught by examining diseases on the patients themselves. Thus, the French say,—La Clinique de la Charité: "The Clinical School of the Hospital La Charité." The term has been introduced into this country, and is occasionally anglicized Clinic.

CLINODES, Clinoid.

CLINOID, Clinoides, Clinodes, Clinoides,

CLINOID PROCESSES, (F.) Apophyses clinoides, are four processes at the upper surface of the sphenoid bone, which have been compared to the posts of a bed. On them the pituitary gland rests. They are divided into anterior and posterior. Each of the anterior terminates in a point called Transverse Spinous Process.

CLINOIDEUS, Clinoid.

CLINOPODIA, Thymus mastichina.

CLINOPODIUM VULGARRE, from κλίνη, 'a bed,' and πούς, 'foot,' so called from the shape of its flowers. Wild Basil, (F.) Grand Basilic savvage. A European plant, which was formerly considered to be an antidote to the bites of venomous animals, to facilitate labour, relieve strangury, stop diarrhœa, &c.

CLIQUETIS, Crepitation.

CLISEOMETER, Clisiometer, from κλίσις, 'inclination,' and μετρον, 'a measure.' An instrument, intended to measure the degree of inclination of the pelvis and to determine the relation between the axis of the pelvis and that of the body.—Osiander, Stein.

A small, round organ, situate at the upper part of the vulva, and separated by a small space from the anterior commissure of the labia. Its base is surrounded by a slight fold, similar to the prepuce; and it is, internally, of the same structure as the corpora cavernosa penis. The artery of the clitoris, (F.) A. Clitoriana, is a branch of the internal pudic. The vein communicates with the internal pudic, and the nerve with the pudic.

CLITORISM, Clitoris'mus. A word, invented to express the abuse made of the clitoris. Also, an unusually large clitoris, Cervicis externæ.

In cases of poisoning by opium, and in old asthmas, its use has been extolled. For this purpose the Moka is the best. It ought to be newly torrefied, but not too much burnt; should be strong, and drunk soon after grinding. Facitious Coffees have been from time to time, recommended, but they are infinitely inferior to the genuine. Various substitutes have been proposed; wheat, barley, hollyberries, acorns, sunflower seeds, beechmast, peas, beans, suco-cory-root, seeds of goosberries and currants left in making wine, and washed,—sliced turnips, &c. The taste is acrid, excoriating the mouth; but the acrimony is lost by drying. It is narcotic, diuretic, and cathartic; and has been given in dropsy, gout, and rheumatism. Dose, from gr. j. to vj. of the fresh bulb. It is supposed to be the active ingredient of the Eau médicinale d'Husson. The active principle is called Colchic'ia. The Colchicum, in an over dose, is an acro-narcotic poison.

COLIC ARTERIES, Ar'teria col'ica, (F.) Ar'tères coliques, are six in number, three of which, given off by the superior mesenteric, are called Colicæ dextræ; and three, proceeding from the inferior mesenteric, Colicæ sinistræ. All proceed towards the colon, passing between the two laminae of the peritoneum, which form the mesocolon, where they ramify and anastomose with each other. The first, Colicæ dextra, Ramus colicæ dexter, is called C. dextra superior, (Meso-colique,—Ch.) The second, C. dextra media, Colicæ media, Ramus colicus medius, Arteria media anastomot'ica, (C. droite, Ch.,) and the third, C. dextra inferior or Ileo-colicæ, (A. cæcæ,—Ch.) Of the three Colicæ sinistræ, the first or superior is called, by Chaussier, Colicæ magna sinistræ; the second or media is not distinguished from the preceding, as they often arise from a common trunk; and the third is called by Chaussier Colicæ parva sinistræ. To these arteries as many veins correspond, which open into the great and little mesenteric.

COLIC LOBE OF THE LIVER is the great lobe of that organ.

In its etymological acceptance, Colic signifies an affection or pain in the colon. But it is employed in a more extensive signification. It includes every acute pain of the abdomen, aggravated at intervals. The word has, however, epithets affixed to it, which render it more or less precise. See Tormina.

COLICA CONVULSIVA, C. Spasmodica, C. pituitosa, C. nervosa, C. idiopathica, Enterospasmus. Colic, not the symptom of any other affection. It is characterized by griping pain in the bowels, chiefly about the navel, with vomiting and costiveness,—the pain increasing at intervals. The indications are to clear the intestines, and allay spasm. Calomel and opium—castor oil and opium—emollient and cathartic enemata, with fomentations, wet or dry, to the abdomen, usually succeed.

COLICA CRAPULOSA, C. accidentalis, C. heliolum, Crapulous colic, Surfeit, (F.) Colique d'Indigestion. A colic, arising from eating indigestible aliments, or digestible aliments in too great abundance. The remedy is obvious.

C. Saturnine, C. des barbouilleurs. Under this head is generally described the colic produced by lead, as well as the other colics mentioned in the synonymy; and they certainly resemble each other greatly, although some of them are more like bilious colic. There is not much to distinguish this variety of colic from others. The same violent pain about the navel is present, with retraction of the abdomen towards the spine. It is apt also to occasion palsy. The only difference of treatment is in the necessity for employing more opium along with the purgative. The paralytic sequelæ must be treated by change of air, rubbing the spine, exercise, &c. Treating the disease upon general principles is infinitely more philosophical, and more successful than the empirical management at La Charité, Paris, which it is unnecessary to detail.

Ventriculi*, Cardialgia.

COLICA STERCOREA, Stercoraceous Colic, Colica Stipata, (F.) Colique stercorale. A species of colic, ascribed to the retention of fecal matters in the intestines. The retention is itself, however, an effect, that may be caused in the same manner as the colic pains themselves.

The ancients designated, by this term, a solid medicine, of a long, cylindrical shape; proper to be introduced into the vagina, anus, or nostrils. They are said to have given it this name because it was shaped like a Rat's Tail, and because there entered into its composition, powders and glutinous matters.—Celsus, Oribasius, Scribonius Largus. At the present day, Collyrium means an application to the eye. Some are pulverulent and dry, Ophthalmempas'ma, Colly'rium siccum, but the greatest part are liquid, Hygrocolly'ria; and they receive different epithets, as astringent, emollient, &c. The colon is usually divided into four portions.

1. The right lumbar or ascending, Colon dextrum, situate in the right lumbar region, and commencing at the cæcum. 2. Transverse colon, Colon transversum, or transverse arch of the colon, the portion of the colon which crosses from the right to the left side, at the upper part of the abdomen. 3. (F.) Béton. The first milk after accouchement. It contains more serum and butter, and less caseum than common milk, and seems to possess an evacuant property, which renders it fit to aid in the expulsion of the meconium. Colostrum formerly meant an emulsion prepared of turpentine and yolk of egg.

COLOUR-BLINDNESS, Achromatopsia.

COLOURS, ACCIDENTAL, Opposita colours, Complementary and Harmonic colours. If the eye have been for some time regarding a particular colour, the retina becomes insensible to this colour; and if, afterwards, it be turned to a sheet of white paper, the paper will not seem to be white, but will be of the colour that arises from the union of all the rays of the solar spectrum, except the one to which the retina has become insensible. Thus, if the eye be directed for some time to a red wafer, the sheet of paper will seem to be of a bluish-green, in a circular spot of the same dimensions as the wafer. This bluish-green image is called an ocular spectrum, because it is impressed upon the eye and may be retained for a short time; and the colour bluish-green, is said to be the accidental colour of the red. If this experiment be made with wafers of different colours, other accidental colours will be observed, varying with the colour of the wafer employed, as in the following table—

Colour of the Wafer.	Accidental colour, or colour of the ocular spectrum.
Red.....	Bluish Green.
Orange.....	Blue.
Yellow.....	Indigo.
Green.....	Violet with a little red.
Blue.....	Orange red.
Indigo.....	Orange-yellow.
Violet.....	Yellow-green.
Black.....	White.
White.....	Black.

If all the colours of the spectrum be ranged in a circle, in the proportions they hold in the spectrum itself, the accidental colour of any particular colour will be found directly opposite. Hence, the two colours have been termed opposite colours. It will follow from what has been said, that if the primary colour, or that to which the eye has been first directed, be added to the accidental colour, the result must be the same impression as that produced by the union of all the rays of the spectrum—white light. The accidental colour, in other words, is what the primitive colour requires to make it white light. The primitive and accidental colours are, therefore, complements of each other; and hence accidental colours have also been called complementary colours. They have likewise been termed harmonic, because the primitive and its accidental colour harmonize with each other in painting.

These terms have been applied to the extraordinary phenomenon of a rapid destruction of the human body, by being reduced to ashes either spontaneously or by the contact of an ignited substance. It is said to have always occurred in the aged, and in those that were fat and hard drinkers. In such, Dr. Traill has found a considerable quantity of oil in the serum of the blood. Vicq d'Azyr, Lair, and Dupuytren think it necessary, that the body should be placed in contact with an ignited substance. Le Cat, Kopp, and Marc are of opinion that this is not necessary. The former appears to be the true view.

COMPLEXION, Complexio. This is often employed, in English, for the colour of the face, as "He has a good complexion,"—a "salow complexion," &c. It formerly had a more extensive signification, and still has in France. It signifies the aggregate of physical characters presented by any individual, considered with respect to his external arrangement or condition. It means more than constitution, for which it is used synonymously in many cases; and differs from temperament, which is less the external condition of the body than the state or disposition of the organs in health.—H. Cloquet.

We compress a limb, affected with adema, varices, hydrops articuli, callous ulcer, &c. The abdomen is compressed after delivery, after paracentesis abdominis, &c. The compression is produced by means of the roller, laced stocking, &c., according to the part, and to the particular case. Moderate pressure aids the contractility of parts, and excites the action of the absorbents; so that large tumours at times disappear after it has been used for some time. A greater degree of pressure occasions, still more, the emaciation of the part, but it is apt to impede the circulation. Pressure is often used to stop or moderate the flow of blood in cases of aneurism or wounds of arteries and veins. In such cases, the compression may be immediate, when applied upon the artery itself, or it may be mediate, when applied through the integuments and soft parts. The French use the term Compression immédiate latérale for that which is exerted perpendicularly to the axis of a vessel, so as to flatten its sides. It is practised with the finger, forceps, tourniquet, compresses, &c.

COMPRESSION OF THE BRAIN. This may arise either from coagula of blood, a soft tumour, a bony excrescence, a depressed portion of the skull, or the presence of some foreign body. The effects vary, according as the compression takes place suddenly or gradually. When suddenly, the symptoms are of the comatose or apoplectic character. When gradually, mania, convulsions, &c., are more likely to occur. Compression, arising from a depressed portion of skull, requires the use of the trephine.

COMPRESSIVE, Compressivus. That which compresses. A compressive bandage is one that compresses the parts to which it is applied.

COMPRESSOR OR COMPRESSORIUM OF DUPUYTREN, (F.) Compresseur de Dupuytren. An instrument for compressing the femoral artery, invented by Dupuytren. It is constructed on the same principles as the tourniquet of J. L. Petit, from which it only differs in this respect;—that, instead of being maintained in its place by a strap, which always compresses more or less the circumference of the limb, the two pads are placed at the extremities of a semicircle of steel, which, by passing from one to the other without touching the parts, limits the pressure to two opposite points of the thigh, and permits the collateral circulation to go on.

COMPRESSOR NARIS, Renæus, Nasalis, Transversalis Nasi, Myrtiformis, Dilatatorius alarum nasi, Constrictor Nasi, C. Narium, C. Naris, Triangularis Nasi, (F.) Maxillo-narinal, Susmaxillo-nasal,—(Ch.) Compresseur de nez, Transversal du nez. A muscle, situate at the sides of the nose; flat and triangular. It arises from the inner part of the fossa canina, and passes to the dorsum of the nose; where it is confounded with that of the opposite side.

COMPRESSOR OR CONSTRICTOR OF NUCK. An instrument for compressing the urethra, to obviate incontinence of urine. It consists of a girdle of iron, which surrounds the pelvis, to which is fixed a plate of the same metal, that compresses the urethra in perinaeo.

COMPRESSOR URETHRÆ. A muscle consisting of two portions—one of which is transverse in its direction, and, in consequence of its having been particularly described by Mr. Guthrie, has been called Guthrie's muscle. It arises from the ramus of the ischium, and passes inwards to embrace the membranous urethra. The other portion is perpendicular, descending from the pubis and passing down to be inserted into the transverse portion of the muscle. This portion has been considered by many to be only the anterior fibres of the levator ani; and having been described by Mr. Wilson, it has been called Wilson's muscle.

COMPRESSOR VENE DORSALIS PENIS. A small muscle, distinctly seen in animals, less distinctly in man, which arises from the ramus of the pubis, and ascending in a direction forwards is inserted above the vena dorsalis, joining with its fellow of the opposite side on the mesial line. Its use is supposed to compress the vein in erection. It is sometimes called the muscle of Houston, after Dr. Houston of Dublin.

CONCEPTION, Conceptio, Conceptus, Cœsis, Androlepsia, from concipio, (con and capio,) 'I conceive.' The impregnation of the ovum by the positive contact of the male sperm, whence results a new being. In order that conception may take place, it is necessary that there should be a uterus, and that the female should be capable of menstruating in a healthy manner. There is every reason, also, to believe that, occasionally, the male sperm is not fecundating; but of this we know little. The whole subject of conception is most mysterious. It seems to occur as follows. During the sexual union, the male sperm passes along the uterus and Fallopian tubes: the fimbriated extremities of the latter seize hold of the ovarium: and the sperm in this manner comes in contact with a matured ovum, and impregnates it. The fecundated ovum remains some time in the ovarium, but at length bursts its covering, is laid hold of by the fimbriated extremity of the Fallopian tube, and passes along the tube into the cavity of the uterus, where it remains for the full period of utero-gestation. Some are of opinion, that the ovum is not impregnated until it has entered the Fallopian tubes, or uterus.

CONCEPTION, FALSE, Falsus Conceptus, Spurius germen, (F.) Fausse conception, Faux germe. An irregular, preternatural conception, the result of which is a mole or some similar production, instead of a properly organized fœtus. See Mole.

CONCEPTUS. The first rudiments of the fœtus, after conception. Also, conception.

CONCEPTUS FALSUS, Conception, false.

CONCHA, Conchus. A liquid measure, amongst the Athenians, equal to half an ounce. Anatomists apply this term to several hollow parts of the body;—as the Concha of the Ear,—Concha Auris, Concha auricula; (F.) Conque—the hollow part of the cartilage of the external ear. It has, also, been applied to the genital organs of the female; to the patella, &c.

It was once used synonymously with adhesion or growing together,—as, "concretion of the toes." Most commonly, it is applied to extraneous and inorganic bodies, of a solid character, met with in different textures, after certain chronic inflammations; or which make their appearance in the joints or in the reservoirs for excrementitious fluids. Concretion is, therefore, frequently synonymous with Calculus, and is then rendered, in Latin, by the word Concrementum. But Concretion has a more extensive signification than Calculus; thus, accidental ossifications or deposits of phosphate of lime in certain organs, and especially in the liver and lungs, are properly called osseous concretions. They could not well be called osseous calculi.

CONCRETION, FIBRINOUS, SANGUINEOUS, Po-

In Surgery, it is used for the agitation often communicated to one organ by a fall upon another; as to the brain from a fall on the breech, &c.

CONCUSSION OF THE BRAIN, Commo'tio Cerebri, Apoplexia nervosa traumatica, Encephalosismus, (F.) Commo'tion du Cerveau, sometimes gives rise to alarming symptoms, even to abolition of the functions of the brain, yet without any sensible organic disease. Slight concussion of the brain, called stunning, consists in vertigo, tinnitus aurium, loss of memory, and stupefaction; all these being temporary. When more severe, there is instant loss of sensation and volition, vomiting, the patient being as if in a sound sleep, but there is no stertorous breathing. Pulse variable, generally more rapid and feeble than in compression; extremities cold. Little can be done here, till reaction has occurred: after this, the case must be treated according to general principles,—by bleeding, blisters, cold applied to the head, &c. After severe concussion, a patient, although apparently well, is not safe till some time after the accident.

CONDENSANTIA, from con, and densus, 'dense,' Incrassantia. Medicines esteemed proper for inspissating the humours.

Some substances are called, at times, aliments, and at others, condiments, according as they constitute the basis or the accessory to any dish: such are cream, butter, mushrooms, olives, &c. Others are always condiments, as they are only used to improve the savour of food, and contain but little nutritive matter. Such are pepper, salt, cinnamon, &c. Almost all condiments are possessed of stimulant properties.

CONDIT, Confection.

CONDITUM, same etymon. A pharmaceutical compound of wine, honey, and some aromatics, especially pepper. Also, a confection.

CONDOM, Ar'mour, (F.) Baudruche, Rodis-gote Anglaise, Gant des Dames, Calotte d'assurand. The intestine cæcum of a sheep, soaked for some hours in water, turned inside out, macerated again in weak, alkaline ley,—changed every twelve hours,—and scraped carefully to abstract the mucous membrane, leaving the peritoneal and muscular coats exposed to the vapour of burning brimstone, and afterwards washed with soap and water. It is then blown up, dried, cut to the length of 7 or 8 inches, and bordered at the open end with a riband. It is drawn over the penis prior to coition, to prevent venereal infection and pregnancy.

CONDYLARTHROSIS, from κωνδύλος, 'a condyle,' and αρθρον, 'a joint.' Articulation by condyles. An elongated head or condyle, received into an elliptical cavity.

CONDYLE, Condyle, Condylius, Capitulum, from κωνδύλος, 'a knot, eminence.' An articular eminence, round in one direction, flat in the other. A kind of process, met with more particularly in the ginglymoid joints;—such as the condyles of the occipital, inferior maxillary bone, &c. Some anatomists have applied the term, however, to eminences that are not articular,—as to the lateral tuberosities at the inferior extremity of the os humeri, and even to certain depressions,—as to the concave articular surfaces or faces at the upper extremity of the tibia. Chaussier calls the transverse root of the zygomatic process Condyle of the temporal bone.

CONSTIPATION, Constipatio, from constipare, (con and stipare,) 'to cram close.' Obstipatio, Adstictio, Arctatio, Obstipatio seu Rotatio alvina, Ischocolia, Alvus adsticta, A. Tarda, A. Dura, Obstructio seu Suppressio alvi, O. Ductus alimentaris, O. intestinalis, Torpor intestinalium, Stypris, Constipatio alvi, Coprostasis, Acopria, Acoprosia, Copropiæchasis, Ischocolia, Dyscolia, (F.) Echauffement, Ventre resserré, Costiveness, Fæcal Retention, Alvine obstruction. A state of the bowels, in which the evacuations do not take place as frequently as usual; or are inordinately hard, and expelled with difficulty. It may be owing either to diminished action of the muscular coat of the intestines, or to diminished secretion from the mucous membrane, or to both. Cathartics will usually remove it; after which its exciting and predisponent causes must be inquired into and obviated to render the cure permanent.

CONSTITUENS, Vehicle, see Prescription.

CONSTITUTIO, Habit of body—c. Nervosa, Nervous diathesis.

CONSTITUTION, Constitutio, Catastasis, Status, from con, and status, from stare, 'to stand.' A collection of several parts, forming a whole. In medicine, Constitution means the state of all the organs of the human body considered in regard to their special and relative arrangement, order, or activity. A good constitution is one in which every organ is well developed, and endowed with due energy, so that all perform their functions with equal facility. Any want of equilibrium in their development and energy forms a difference in the constitution. We say that a man is of a good or robust, a delicate or weak constitution, when he is commonly healthy, or commonly labouring under, or unusually susceptible of, disease.

CONSTITUTION OF THE ATMOSPHERE, Constitutio A'ris, (F.) Constitution Atmosphérique. The condition of the atmosphere, as regards dryness and humidity, temperature, heaviness, direction of the winds, &c., considered as respects its influence on the animal economy.

CONSTITUTION, EPIDEM'IC, Constitution Med'ical, (F.) Constitution médicale, C. épidémique. The aggregate of meteorological conditions, so far as they are appreciable, during which diseases prevail epidemically.

CONSTITUTIONAL, (F.) Constitutionnel. Belonging to the constitution of an individual; to his manner of being; as constitutional phthisis, c. gout, &c. By some, this epithet has been given to diseases, produced by the constitution of the atmosphere; but this acceptation is not common.

CONSTRICTEURS DE LA VULVE, Constrictores cunni—c. du Vagin, Constrictores cunni.

CONSTRICATIO, Astriction, Systole.

CONSTRICATIVA, Syptica.

CONSTRICteur, from constringere, (con, and stringere), 'to bind.' (F.) Constricteur. That which binds in a circular direction. A sphincter (q. v.). Different muscles are so called.

CONSTRICteur ANI, Sphincter ani externus—c. of Nuck, Compressor of Nuck.

CONSTRICteurs ALARUM NASI, Depressor alae nasi—c. Isthmi faucium, Glossostaphylinus—c. Nasi, Compressor naris—c. Oris, Orbicularis oris—c. Palpebrarum, Orbicularis palpebrarum.

CONSTRICteurs CUNNI, Clitoridis inferioris lateralis et planis musculti, Sphincter Vaginalis, (F.) Constrictors du vagin, C. de la Vulve. Small muscles, which originate beneath the clitoris, descend along the sides of the vagina, and terminate by becoming confounded with the transversus perinaei and external sphincter ani muscles. Their use is to contract the entrance of the vagina.

CONSTRICteurs LARYNGIS. Lieutaud describes, under the name Grand constricteur du larynx, the muscle Crico-arytenoideus lateralis with the Thyro-arytenoideus.

CONSTRICteur ŒSOPHAGI, Constrictor of the Œsophagus, (F.) Constricteur de l'Œsophage, Muscle œsophagien. A fasciculus of fleshy, circular fibres, at the upper part of the œsophagus.

CONSTRICteurs PHARYNGIS, Constrictors of the Pharynx, Sphincter Gulae. Muscular expansions which assist in forming the parietes of the pharynx. Three of these are generally admitted. 1. The Constrictor Pharyngis inferior, Crico-Pharyngeus and Thyro-pharyngeus, (F.) Crico-thyro-pharyngien. It is broad, very thin, quadrilateral, seated superficially, extending from the thyroid and cricoid cartilages as far as the middle of the pharynx, and uniting, on the median line, with that of the opposite side. 2. The Constrictor Pharyngis Medius, Hyo-pharyngeus and Chondro-pharyngeus, Syndesmo-pharyngeus, (F.) Hyo-glossobasi-pharyngien, occupies the middle part of the pharynx. It is triangular, and attached, anteriorly, to the great and little cornu of the os hyoides; to the stylohyoid ligament; and terminates, posteriorly, by joining its fellow of the opposite side. 3. The Constrictor Pharyngis superior, Cephalo-pharyngeus, Glossopharyngeus, Mylo-pharyngeus, Pterygo-pharyngeus, (F.) Pterigo-syndesmo-staphili-pharyngien, is quadrilateral, and extends from the internal ala of the pterygoid process, from the inter-maxillary ligament, from the internal oblique line of the jaw, and from the base of the tongue to the posterior part of the pharynx.

The constrictors of the pharynx contract it. They can likewise approximate the ends to each other. Chaussier considers those and the stylo-pharyngeus as but one muscle, and includes all under this last name.

CONSTRINGENTIA, Astringents, Styptics.

CONSUEtUDO, Habit—c. Menstrua, Menses.

CONSULTATION, Consulta'tio, Delibera'tio, Œnolog'ia, Contentio, Symbolæsis, from consulere, consultum, 'to hold council.' This word has several acceptations. In English, it means, almost always, the meeting of two or more practitioners, to deliberate on any particular case of disease. In France, it signifies the written result of such deliberations, as well as the opinion of a physician, given to a patient, who consults him, either personally or by writing.

CONSULTING PHYSICIAN or SURGEON, (F.) Médecin ou Chirurgien consultant. One who consults with the attending practitioner, regarding any case of disease. Some physicians, surgeons, and accoucheurs confine themselves to consulting practice.

CONSUMMATUM, Consummé.

CONSUMMATUS, from con, cum, 'with,' and summus, 'the whole.' Confirmed; established; developed,—as Phthisis consummata, 'confirmed consumption.'

CONSUMPTION, from consumere, (con and sumere), 'to waste away;' Consumptio, Consumptio, Syntes'is, (F.) Consumption. Progressive emaciation or wasting away. This condition precedes death in the greater part of chronic diseases, and particularly in phthisis pulmonalis: on this account it is, that phthisis has received the name consumption.—See Phthisis. Fèvre de Consumption, Consumptive fever, is the same as Hæctic fever, (q. v.).

CONSUMPTION OF THE BOWELS, Enterophthisis—c. Pulmonary, Phthisis pulmonalis.

CONSUMPTIVA. Same etymology. Caustics, used for the destruction of fungi. Burnt alum, lunar caustic, &c., were formerly so called.

CONSUMTIO, Consumption.

CONTABESCENTIA, from contabescere, (con and tabescere), 'to grow lean.' Consumption, marasmus, atrophy, &c.

CONTACT, Contactus, from con and tangere, 'to touch.' The state of two bodies that touch each other. In the theory of contagious diseases, we distinguish immediate or direct contact, as when we touch a patient labouring under one of those diseases; and mediate or indirect contact, when we touch, not the patient himself, but objects that have touched or emanated from him. The air is, most commonly, the medium by which this last kind of contact is effected.

CONTAGION, Contag'io, Contages, Contagium, Aporrh'a, Apoc'rysis. Same etymon. The transmission of a disease from one person to another by direct or indirect contact. The term has, also, been applied, by some, to the action of miasmata arising from dead animal or vegetable matter, bogs, fens, &c., but in this sense it is now abandoned. Contagious diseases are produced either by a virus, capable of causing them by inoculation, as in small-pox, cow-pox, hydrophobia, syphilis, &c., or by miasmata, proceeding from a sick individual, as in plague, typhus gravior, and in measles and scarlatina. Scrofula, phthisis pulmonalis, and cancer, have, by some, been esteemed contagious, but apparently without foundation. Physicians are, indeed, by no means unanimous in deciding what diseases are contagious, and what not. The contagion of plague and typhus, especially of the latter, is denied by many. It seems probable, that a disease may be contagious under certain circumstances and not under others. A case of common fever, arising from common causes, as from cold, if the patient be kept in a close, foul situation, may be converted into a disease, capable of producing emanations, which may excite a similar disease in those exposed to them. Contagion and infection are generally esteemed synonymous. Frequently, however, the former is applied to diseases not produced by contact; as measles, scarlet fever, &c., whilst infection is used for those that require positive contact; as itch, syphilis, &c., and conversely. Diseases, which cannot be produced in any other way than by contagion, are said to have their origin in specific contagion; as small-pox, cow-pox, measles, hydrophobia, syphilis, &c. Those which are produced by contagion, and yet are supposed to be sometimes owing to other causes, are said to arise from common contagion; as typhus, cynanche parotidæa, &c.

CONTA'GIOUS, Contagio'sus. Capable of being transmitted by mediate or immediate contact; as a contagious disease, contagious fever, contagious effluvia, &c.

CONTAGIUM, Contagion, Miasm.

CONTEMPLABLES DIES, Critical days.

CONTEMPLATIF, (F.) Contemplati'vus, (con and templum.) Appertaining to contemplation. The predominant idea of the melancholic—of the monomaniac—is sometimes called contemplative.

CONTEMPLATIO, Catalepsy.

CONTEMPLATIVUS, Contemplatif.

CONSENSIO, Tension.

CONTENTIO, Consultation.

CONTEXTURE, Contextura, Contextus, from con and texere, (quasi texere, from texere, 'to cover,') 'to weave,' 'to make a web.' Arrangement of parts;—texture. A name given, metaphorically, to the structure of organized bodies; as the texture of muscles, fibres, &c. See Tissue, and Texture.

CONTIGUITY, DIARTHROSIS OF, see Contiguity.

CONTINENCE, Continen'tia, from contere, (con and tenere, 'to hold or keep,') 'to contain oneself;' 'to restrain.' Abstinence from the pleasures of physical love.

CONTINENS, Continent.

CONTINENT, Continens. This word is synonymous with Continued; (F.) Continu.

CONTINENT CAUSE, Causa conjuncta, is a cause, real or presumed, which, having given rise to a disease, continues to act during the whole of its duration. It may be considered synonymous with proximate cause. A continent fever, Febris continens, is one which preserves, during its whole course, the same degree of intensity, without any remission or sensible exacerbation. A disease which continues uninterrupted, has been also called Æipathê'a, Æipathê'a or Aipathî'a.

fever which presents no interruption in its course. Continued fevers form a division in the class Pyrexia of Cullen, and include three genera,—Synocha, Synochus, and Typhus. It is proper to remark, that some of the older writers make a distinction between the continual fever, οὐραχης, febris continua, and the synochus or febris continens. Thus, Rhases states that the synochus or continens is a fever, which consists of one paroxysm from beginning to end; whilst the continual is allied to intermittents.

CONTINUITY, Continu'itas. An adhesion of two things between each other, so that they cannot be separated without fracture or laceration.

CONTINUITY, DIARTHROSES OF, (F.) Diarthroses de Continuité, are movable joints, in which the bones are continuous, but do not touch immediately, there being between them a ligamentous substance, whose flexibility permits motion. The vertebral articulations are examples of this. DIARTHROSES OF CONTIGUITY, Diarthroses de Contiguité, on the other hand, are movable articulations, in which the bones are not continuous, but touch by surfaces covered with a cartilaginous layer, which is always moistened by synovia.

CONTINUITY, SOLUTION OF, is any division of parts, previously continuous. Wounds and fractures are solutions of continuity. The word Continuity is opposed to Contiguity: the latter meaning the condition of two things which are near each other, or touch without uniting. There is contiguity between the head of the humerus and the glenoid cavity of the scapula, but not continuity.

CONTONDANT, Contunding.

CONTORSIO, Contorsion—c. Columnæ vertebralis, Rhachiostrophosis.

CONTORSION, Contors'io, from contorqueo, (con and torquere, 'to wring,') 'I twist about.' Violent movement of a part, accompanied with a kind of torsion; as contortion of the face.

An incision, made in the most depending part of a wound or abscess, when the first opening is not situate in a manner favourable for the discharge of the pus.

CONTRÄEXTENSIO, Counterextension.

CONTRACTILE, Contractilis, from contrahere, (con and trahere,) 'to draw together.' Capable of contracting. The fibre of muscle is contractile.

CONTRACTILITÉ, Contractility—o. par défaut d'Extension, Elasticity—c. de Tissu, Elasticity.

CONTRACTILITY, Contractil'itas: same etymon; (F.) Contractilité. That vital property, which gives, to certain parts, the power of contracting. The muscles of locomotion are endowed with a power of voluntary contractility, or one dependent immediately on the action of the brain;—the muscles of the viscera of digestion, and other internal organs, enjoy an involuntary contractility. Contractility and irritability are frequently used synonymously to signify the property possessed by any tissue of contracting on the application of an appropriate stimulus.

CONTRACTILITY, Irritability.

CONTRACTIO CORDIS, Systole.

CONTRACTION, Contractio. Same etymon; Systole. Action of contracting. When we speak of the contraction of a muscle, we mean the phenomenon it exhibits during the time it is in action.

CONTRACTURA. Same etymon. Acampsis, Entesia articul'ris, Rigor artuum, Muscular Stiff-joint. A state of permanent rigidity and progressive atrophy of the flexor muscles, which prevents the motions of extension beyond a certain limit. The affected muscles form hard cords beneath the skin. On dissection, they are found converted into tendinous fibres, the fleshy fibres having almost disappeared, when the disease has been of any duration. It succeeds, frequently, other diseases, particularly rheumatism, neuralgia, convulsions, syphilis, colica pictionum, &c. The warm bath, vapour bath, or thermal waters, oleaginous embrocations, mechanical extension of the limbs, &c., are the chief means of treatment.

CONTRA-FISSURA, from contra, 'against,' and fendo, fissum, 'I cleave;' Repercussio, Rason'itus, Casagma Pissura contraja'cons, Apoche'ma, Anticom'ma, Antidopt, Anticru'nis, Anticrusma, Infertus'mium, Counterstroke, (F.) Contro-coup, Contra-fente, Contro-fracture. A fracture, contusion, or injury, produced, by a blow, in a part distant from that which is struck. Five species of contra-fissura or contro-coups may occur in the skull. 1. When the internal table yields and fractures. 2. When the bone breaks in any other part than the one struck. 3. When a bone, which has been struck, remains uninjured, and its neighbour is fractured. 4. When the bone is fractured in a place diametrically opposite to that struck, as in fractures at the base of the cranium, from a fall on the vertex; and lastly, when the violence of the blow produces a separation of the neighbouring or distant sutures. These fractures of the skull are also called Fractures par résonance.

CONTRO-STIMULANT, Contrastimulans, Hyposthenic, from contra, 'against,' and stimulus, 'that which excites.' A substance that possesses a particular, debilitating property, acting upon the excitability in a manner opposite to stimulus. A name given to therapeutical agents, which, according to the Italian theory of Contro-stimulus, are endowed with the property of diminishing excitement by a specific action. These agents are by no means clearly defined.

CONTRO-STIMULUS. Same etymon. The name given by Rasori, about thirty years ago, to a new medical doctrine, of which he was the originator—La nuova Dottrina Medica Italiana. It is founded on the contro-stimulant property, attributed to a certain number of medicines. In this doctrine, as in that of Brown, under the name sacitability, a fundamental principle of physiology is admitted, by virtue of which living beings are endowed with an aptitude for feeling the action of external agents or exciting influences, and of reacting on these same influences. When this excitability is too great, there is excess of stimulus or Hypersthenia: when too little, there is deficiency or Hyposthenia. Diseases, general and local, are divided into three great classes, or into, 1. Hypersthenic; 2. Hyposthenic; 3. Irritative. The contro-stimulant physicians admit only two classes of medicines—stimulants and contro-stimulants.

CONTUNDING, Contu'sing, Contus'dens, from contundere, (con, and tundere) 'to bruise.' (F.) Contondant. That which causes contusions. An epithet given to round, blunt, vulnerating projectiles, which bruise or lacerate parts without cutting them.

CONTUSION, Contu'sio, a Bruiss, Collic'io, Phlasma, Thlasis, Thlas'ma, Th. contusio, Rheget, Rhegma, Rhegmus, Fama; Fama; Fama; (F.) Meustrissure. Same etymon. An injury or lesion—arising from the impulse of a body with a blunt surface—which presents no loss of substance, and no apparent wound. If the skin be divided, the injury takes the name of contused wound. The differences of contusions, as to extent, are of course infinite. When slight, the blood stagnates in the capillaries of the skin, or is effused into the subcutaneous cellular tissue. Time and cold applications remove it. When the texture of the parts has been lacerated, there is effusion of blood, with more or less torpor in the part. Cooling applications, general or topical bleeding, emollients, poultices, &c., are here necessary, according to circumstances. In the severest kinds of contusion, all the soft and solid parts, except the skin, are bruised, and, at times, reduced to a kind of pap. When the disorganization is to this extent, there is no hope except in amputation. A deep confusion of the soft parts has been called Sarcotk'lasia, and Sarcotk'lasma.

CONUS ARTERIOSUS, Infundib'ulum of the heart. The portion of the right ventricle from which the pulmonary artery proceeds, forms a prominence on the right side of the anterior furrow of the heart, and is prolonged towards the left, becoming narrower at the same time, so as to form a funnel-shaped projection, which extends a little beyond the base of the ventricles. This is the Conus arteriosus.

It is given in gonorrhœa, gleet, leucorrhœa, &c.: in the dose of grt. x to ʒj, twice or thrice a day. Should symptoms of urticaria or diarrhœa arise, the dose is too large, and must be diminished. It can be inspissated by means of magnesia so as to be made into pills, and recently a plan has been devised for enveloping it in gelatin, so that its taste is entirely concealed. It is fixed to submarine rocks, in the form of a shrub; and is of a bright red colour. It is the habitation of a multitude of animals, of the Zoophyta order, and is formed of a calcareous substance, secreted by the animals themselves. It is in very hard, concentric layers; covered, externally, by a species of porous bark, full of cellules, each of which contains one of these animals. Linnaeus calls the red coral, Isis nobilitis, and M. de Lamarck, Coral'ium rubrum. It is much fished for on the coasts of Barbary and Sicily. Coral was formerly esteemed tonic, absorbent, astringent, &c.; but analysis has shown, that it contains only carbonate of lime and a little gelatin.—Dioscorides, Pliny, Oribasius, the Groenopios, &c. The Corallium album is a hard, white, calcareous brittle substance, the nidus of the Madrepora oculata. It has been given as an absorbent.

It is particularly manifest in pleurisy, and hence one of its names. For its production, it appears to be requisite, that there should be an increase in the proportion of the fibrinous element of the blood over that of the red corpuscles.

The buff is generally believed to consist of fibrin; but, according to the researches of Mulder, it is composed of a binoxide of protein, which is insoluble in boiling water, and a trioxide which is soluble. These oxides are comprehended by Mulder under the name oxyprotein.

When the blood presents the above appearance, it is said to be buffy.

CORK, Suber.

CORMUS. In botany, when the stem of a plant, without creeping or rooting, is distended under ground, retaining a round or oval form, it is so called. The Cormus is vulgarly termed a root,—radix.

CORN, (Saxon corn), (G.) K e r n. In England, this word means the Cerealia, or those seeds, which grow in ears, not in pods. In the United States, Corn always means Indian Corn. Its English sense corresponds to the French Blé or Bled.

CORN, Clavus, Clavus Pedis, Bophyma Clavus, Gommaris, (F.) Cor, Ognon, from cornu, 'horn.' A small, hard, corneous tumour, which forms upon the foot, generally on the toes; and is commonly produced on the most projecting parts, by the pressure of too tight shoes. A part of the corn is raised above the skin, and forms a round tumour, like the head of a nail: the other portion, which serves as its base, is buried more or less deeply in the integuments, and occasionally extends as far as the tendons and periosteum. Corns may, sometimes, be removed, by immersing the feet in warm water, but commonly they return. They can, likewise, be destroyed by the knife or caustics; but these operations are not as simple as they seem. In the way of palliation, they must be constantly pared; and, for the purpose of preventing pressure, any soft plaster, spread upon linen or leather, may be applied, with a hole in the centre to receive the corn; and layer after layer of plaster be added, until they attain the level of the corn. When very irritable, the lunar caustic, rubbed over the surface, will generally diminish irritability surprisingly, and in a mode not easy of explanation.

One of the coats of the eye, so called because it has some resemblance to horn. It is termed transparent to distinguish it from the opaque—Cornea opa'ca or Sclerotica. It is convex, anteriorly; concave, posteriorly; forming nearly one-fifth of the anterior part of the eye, and representing a segment of a sphere about seven lines and a half, or in. 0.625 in diameter. It seems to be constituted of laminae in superposition, but of the precise number anatomists are not agreed. Henle assigns it four; the third, a very solid cartilaginous lamella, being called Membrana de Demours or M. de Descemet. Messrs. Todd and Bowman assign it five layers.

They cover the region of the kidneys and renal capsules, which are formed afterwards; and they are presumed to be the organs of urinary secretion during the first periods of fetal existence.

They consider it to surround the ovule, when it descends into the uterus, and to enclose the shaggy chorion. It is absorbed during the first months of utero-gestation, so as to expose the next membrane to the contact of the decidua, with which a connexion takes place at the part where the placenta is to be formed. In that part, Boer and Granville consider, that the Cortex Ovi is never altogether obliterated, but only made thinner, and in process of time is converted into a mere pellicle or envelope, which not only serves to divide the filiform vessels of the chorion into groups or cotyledons, in order to form the placenta, but also covers those cotyledons. The false ribs are the remaining 5: the uppermost three being united, by means of their cartilages, to the cartilage of the last true rib. The others are free at their external extremity, and, hence, have been called Floating ribs, Côtes flottantes. The vertebral extremity of each rib is slightly expanded. The first two terms are respectively derived from κρανιον, 'cranium,' λογος, 'a discourse,' and ερασην, 'to examine.' They signify a description, or simply an examination of the different parts of the external surface of the cranium, in order to deduce from thence a knowledge of the different intellectual, and moral dispositions. Strictly speaking, it is by Cranioscopy that we acquire a knowledge of Craniology, or of Organology or Cranology, as it has, also, been termed. These words are generally, however, used in the same sense. The cranium being moulded to the brain, there are as many prominences on the bone, as there are projections at the surface of the brain. According to Gall, each projection, which he calls an organ, is the seat of a particular intellectual or moral faculty, and all persons endowed with the same faculty, have, at the same part of the brain, a prominence, which is indicated, externally, by a bump or projection in the bony case. The System of Gall is made to comprise 27 prominences, which answer to 27 faculties. The following Table exhibits these supposed organs, and their seat.

Seated in the cerebellum. It is manifested at the surface of the cranium by two round protuberances, one on each side of the nape of the neck.

Indicated at the external occipital protuberance.

About the middle of the posterior margin of the parietal bone; anterior to the last.

Seated a little above the ears; in front of the last, and towards the mastoid angle of the parietal bone.

Anterior to that of cunning, of which it seems to be a prolongation, and above that of mechanics, with which it contributes to widen the cranium, by the projection which they form at the side of the frontal bone.

Behind the top of the head, at the extremity of the sagittal suture, and on the parietal bone.

Situate at the side of the last, near the posterior internal angle of the parietal bone.

Corresponds to the parietal protuberance.

Situate at the root of the nose, between the two eyebrows, and a little above them.

Answers to the frontal sinus, and is indicated externally by two prominences at the inner edge of the eyebrows, near the root of the nose, and outside of the organ of memory of things.

At the inner angle of the orbit.

Situate at the posterior part of the base of the two anterior lobes of the brain, on the frontal part of the bottom of the orbit, so as to make the eye prominent.

Also at the top of the orbit, between the preceding and that of the knowledge of colour.

The middle part of the eyebrows; encroaching a little on the forehead.

A little above and to one side of the last; above the outer third of the orbital arch.

On the outside of the organ of the sense of the relation of colour, and below the last.

A fundamental principle with the Cranialogists or Phrenologists is,—that the brain does not act as a single organ, but that it consists of a plurality of organs: but, were we able to admit this, the assignment of the seat of different faculties could not but be considered premature.

CRITICAL DAYS, Dies critici, D. judicatorii, D. Decretorii, D. Principis, D. Radicales, D. Contemplabiles, D. Internuntii, (F.) Jours critiqués, are those on which a crisis, it is imagined, is most likely to happen. According to Hippocrates and Galen, the greatest number of fevers terminate favourably on the 7th day, and many on the 14th;—these two days being the most propitious. Next to these come, in order of efficiency, the 9th, 11th, 20th or 21st, 17th, 5th, 4th, 3d, 15th, 27th, and 28th. The sixth day was called by Galen, the Tyrant, τυραννος, because the crises, that happened then, were generally unfavourable. After this, the most unfavourable were the 8th, 10th, 12th, 16th, and 19th. The 13th was a sort of neutral day; the crises which happened on it, being neither favourable nor unfavourable. Days were, also, divided into Intercalary, on which the crises happened less frequently, and were less complete than on the critical or indicatory;—and into vacant and non-decretory, on which a crisis hardly ever occurred. According to this division, they were enumerated as follows:

Critical days, 7th, 14th, 20th, 27th, 34th, 40th, 60th, &c.
Indicatory days, 4th, 11th, 17th, 24th, &c.
Intercalary days, 3d, 5th, 6th, 9th, &c.

CRURÆUS, Cruralis.

CRURAL, Cruralis, from crus, 'the thigh, and the lower limb.' What belongs to the thigh or lower limb.

CRURAL ARCH, Inguinal Arch, Femoral Arch, (F.) Arcoæ crurales, A. inguinale (Ch.)—POUPART'S Ligament, L. of Fallopius. This arch is formed by the internal portion of the inferior edge of the aponeurosis of the obliquus externus muscle, which is attached, at one end, to the pubis; at the other, to the anterior and superior spinous process of the ilium. At its posterior and inner part, the aponeurosis, forming the arch, sends off a falciform reflection, which is attached along the crest of the pubis, and is known under the name of GIMBERNAT'S Ligament. Beneath this arch, the vessels, nerves, and muscles make their exit from the pelvis to the thigh.

CRURAL ARTERY, Femoral Artery, (F.) Arteria cruralis, A. Pelvi-crurale.—(Ch.) is the continuation of the external iliac. It extends from the crural arch to the aperture in the triceps, or to the ham. Chaussier applies the name Arteria crurale to the trunk, which extends from the primitive or common iliac to the tibial arteries; embracing, of course, the external iliac, femoral, and popliteal.

CRURAL CANAL, Crural Ring, Femoral canal or ring. M. Jules Cloquet has described this canal with minuteness, and given it the name Anneau crural, Anneau fémoral. It is nearly an inch long, triangular, more spacious above than below, and shorter and broader in the female than in the male. Its upper orifice is bounded, anteriorly, by the crural arch; posteriorly, by the crista of the pubis; on the outer side by the psoas and iliacus muscles, covered by the iliac aponeurosis, and, at the inner, by Gimbernat's ligament. This orifice is covered by the peritoneum, and, according to M. Cloquet, is closed by a more or less resisting septum, which he has named Septum crurale, crural septum. In its course, the crural canal has its anterior paries formed by the superficial expansion of the fascia lata: the posterior by the pectineus, covered by the deep-seated expansion of the fascia; and more externally by the psoas and iliacus muscles, covered by an expansion of the fascia iliaca. Its inferior orifice is formed by the foramen of the fascia lata, which gives passage to the vena saphæna. It is at the upper orifice of this canal, that Femoral or Crural Hernia, the Hernia inguinale of Chaussier, occurs; which would be more common, were it not for the fibrous cellular septum there situate.

CRURAL NERVE proceeds from the lumbar plexus, and is situate at the outer side of the psoas muscle and crural artery. After it has passed under the crural arch, it divides into cutaneous and muscular branches. One of the branches, which is larger than the rest, is called the Saphæna nervus. It gives off filaments to the integuments of the knee, to the inner part of the leg, and to the dorsal surface of the foot. The remainder of the branches of the crural are distributed to the anterior and inner part of the thigh. The Accessory of the Crural Nerve is a term given to the 4th and 5th pairs of lumbar nerves.

CRURAL PLEXUS of Chaussier is the union of the anterior branches of the last four pairs of lumbar nerves, and the first four sacral; forming the lumbar and sacral plexuses of most anatomists.

CRURAL RING, Crural canal—c. Septum, see Crural canal.

CRURAL VEIN, Femoral Vein, has the same arrangement as the artery. It receives only one great branch, the saphæna.

CRURAL, Triceps cruris.

CRURALIS, Cruralis. A part of the Triceps cruralis of the French, or of the Trifémoro-rotation of Chaussier. The cruralis is situate at the anterior, outer, and inner part of the thigh. It arises, fleshy, from between the two trochanters, adheres firmly to most of the fore part of the os femoris, and is inserted, tendinous, into the upper part of the patella, behind the rectus. Its use is to assist the vasti and rectus in the extension of the leg. Under Muscle Triceps Crural, the French describe the cruralis and the two vasti. Some small muscular slips, sometimes found under the cruræus muscle, and inserted into the capsular ligament of the knee-joint, have been called Sub-cruræi.

The lancets are placed in such a manner in the scarificator, that, when it is applied upon the affected part, the whole are, by means of a spring, pushed suddenly into it. After scarification, the cupping-glass, which has been previously exhausted by heat, or by an exhausting syringe, is applied. The pressure of the air within the glass being thus diminished, the necessary quantity of blood may be drawn. See Bdello-meter. Dry cupping, Cucurbitulas sicca, is the application of the glasses, without previous scarification. (F.) Ventouses seches. It is used to prevent the activity of absorption from any wounded part; occasionally, to excite suppuration in indolent abscesses; and to remove the pus when an abscess is opened. Cupping, taken without any epithet, means the abstraction of blood by means of the scarificator and cups:—(F.) Ventouses scarifiées, (L.) Cucurbitula cruenta, C. cum Ferro. The verb 'to cup,' signifies to draw blood by cupping.

Impure subacetate of copper. This, as usually met with, is in masses, difficult to break; not deliquescent; foliaceous; of a fine bluish-green colour, and salt taste. It is tonic, emetic, escharotic, and detergent; but scarcely ever employed internally. Chiefly used in detergent ointments. Dose, as a tonic, under  $\frac{1}{2}$  gr.: emetic, from gr. j. to gr. ij. Powdered verdigris appears to be the active ingredient in Smellonè's Eye-Salve, which may be imitated by rubbing half a drachm of finely powdered verdigris with a little oil, and then mixing it with an ounce of yellow basilicon.

An ointment composed of one drachm of finely powdered verdigris, with an ounce of lard or spermaceti ointment, is used in psoriasis, tetter, &c.

CUTANEOUS EXHALATION AND ABSORPTION are those which take place from the skin.

CUTANEOUS NERVES, Cutaneal Nerves, so called, are two in number, and belong to the upper extremity. They are given off from the brachial plexus. The internal cutaneous, Cubito-cutané, (Ch.,) descends along the inner part of the arm, and divides above the elbow into two branches; the outermost of which follows the outer edge of the biceps, and spreads over the anterior and inner part of the forearm; and the innermost accompanies the basilic vein, passing to the corresponding side of the hand and little finger. The external cutaneous, Radio- cutané, (Ch.,) Mus'culo-Cutaneous, Perforans CASSE'RII, passes outwards, perforates the coraco-brachialis; descends along the anterior and outer part of the arm; passes as far as the middle of the fold of the elbow, under the median cephalic; and descends along the anterior and outer edge of the forearm. At some distance above the wrist, it divides into two branches; an outer, which is distributed on the back of the hand, the thumb and index finger; and an inner, which descends on the muscles of the thumb into the palm of the hand, and divides into fine filaments, which may be traced to the fingers.

Nervus Cuta'neus Minor, of Wrisberg, also takes its origin from the axillary plexus, but is more particularly connected with the ulnar nerve. It soon separates from the ulnar, running afterwards between it and the inner side of the arm. A little below the axilla it divides into two branches, which are distributed to the arm.

Chaussier calls the cephalic and basilic veins the Radial and Cubital Cutaneous.

CUTI, Catechu.

CUTICULA, Epidermis.

CUTIO, Oniscus.

CUTIS, Pellis, Fella, Co'rium, Derna, Deris, Anthro'ps, Anthro'pon, Skin, (F.) Peau. A dense, resisting membrane, of a flexible and extensible nature, which forms the general envelope of the body; and is continuous with the mucous membranes, through the different natural apertures. It is generally considered to be formed of three distinct layers—the epidermis, rete or more properly corpus mucosum, and corium. Some anatomists, however, separate it into several others. Its outer surface is covered by a number of small eminences, called papillæ, which are generally regarded as eminently nervous and vascular. The skin is our medium of communication with external bodies. It protects the subjacent parts; is the seat of touch, and, through it, are exhaled the watery parts of the blood, which are not needed in the nutrition of the body. The state of the skin, as regards heat and dryness, affords us useful information in our pathological investigations. Its colour, too, requires attention: the paleness of disease is as characteristic as the rosy complexion of health. The colour of the skin varies according to the age, sex, &c. As a general principle, it is finer in the female and child than in the male and adult. In old age it becomes light-coloured, thin, and dry. It likewise varies according to the races, &c.

(F.) Cyanosis, Maladie bleue, Tatire bleu. A disease, in which the whole of the surface of the body is coloured blue. It is often symptomatic, and commonly depends on a direct communication between the cavities of the right and left side of the heart. Such communication does not, however, always occasion the bleu dis'ease, but it is generally thought that the disease never exists without this state of parts; or without some obstacle to the circulation in the right side of the heart. The blueness does not seem to be owing to the admixture of black and red blood. A child affected with blueness is said to be cyano'sed, (F.) Cyanosé.

CYNANCHE, Angina, from κυν, 'a dog,' and αγχε, 'I suffocate,' (1), Sore Throat, Paracyan'che, Synan'che, Prunel'la, Squinan'thia, Empres'ma Paristhm'is, Cauma Paristhm'is, Isthm'is, Paristhm'is, Inflammatio Fau'cium, 'Dog choak.' Inflammation of the supradiaphragmatic portion of the alimentary canal, and of the lining membrane of the upper part of the air-passages.—(F.) Angina, Esquinancia, Mal de Gorge, Synancia, Squinancia, Kinancia. It comprises the following chief varieties.

CYNANCHE EPIDEMICA, Cynanche maligna—c. Externa, C. Parotidea—c. Faucium, C. tonsillaris—c. Gangrenosa, Cynanche maligna—c. Laryngea, Laryngitis.

CYNANCHE MALIGNA, C. gangrenosa, Angina ulcero'sa, Febri's epidem'ica cum Anginâ, Empres'ma Paristhm'is Maligna, Tonsillarum gangra'na, Tonsill'la pestilens, Cynanche epidem'ica, C. pur'puro-parotidea, Cynanche ulcero'sa, Epidem'ica gutturis lues, Pestilens faucium affectus, Padan'choné (1), Gangrana Tonsillarum, Ulcus Syriacum, Garrottillo, Carbunculus anginosus, Angina ulcerculosa, A. epidem'ica, A. gangrenosa, A. maligna, A. faucium maligna, Isthmodyphus, Putrid, Ulcerous Sore Throat, Gangrenous Inflammation of the Pharynx, (F.) Angina gangrenosa, A. Maligna. It is characterized by crimson redness of the mucous membrane of the fauces and tonsils; ulcerations, covered with mucus, and spreading sloughs, of an ash or whitish hue; the accompanying fever typhus. It is often epidemic, and generally contagious; and is frequently found accompanying scarlet fever,—giving rise to the variety, Scarlatina maligna. Cynanche maligna has been made to include both diphtheritic and gangrenous pharyngitis. See Pharyngitis, diphtheritic.

The general treatment is the same as in typhus; and stimulant antiseptic gargles must be used, consisting, for example, of the decoction of bark and muriatic acid.

CYNANCHE MAXILLARIS, c. Parotidea—c. Œsophagea, (Œsophagitis).

CYNANCHE PAROTIDEA, Empres'ma Parotitis, Parotitis, Parot'is, Parotid'itis, Cynan'che Parotidea, C. externa, Angina maxillaris, Gissa, Angina externa, Angina parotidea externa, P. epidem'ica, P. erysipelato'sa, Erythrochoer'ras, P. contagio'sa, P. spu'ria, P. sero'so glutin'is tumens, Cynan'che maxillaris, Gonyocynan'che, Gnathocynan'che, Inflammatio parotidum, Inflatio parotidum, Catar'rhus Bala'nulæ'nus, Branks (Scotch), Mumps, (F.) Inflammation de la Parotide, Oreillons, Ourlés. The characteristic symptoms are:—a painful tumour of the parotid gland, or of the cellular tissue surrounding it, or of both, not of the suppurative kind; frequently extending to the maxillary gland. It is very conspicuous externally, and is often accompanied with swelling of the testes in the male, and of the mammae in the female; the testes being sometimes absorbed afterwards. It is generally epidemic, and apparently contagious. The treatment is very simple; the adoption merely of the antiphlogistic plan, under which it usually soon disappears. When inflammation of the mammae or testes supervenes, it must be treated as if idiopathic.

Epidem'ic Parot'is or Mumps is also termed

CYNANCHE PHARYNGEA, Empres'ma Paristhm'is Pharyngea, Isthm'is, Pharyng'itis, Inflammatio Pharyng'is, Parasyan'che, Angina inflammatoria, Sp. iv.—(Boerhaave.) (F.) Angina Pharyngis, Catar'ris pharyngis. Inflammation of the pharynx.

This disease can hardly be said to differ, in pathology or treatment from Cynanche tonsillaris. The same may be remarked of the Cynanche Œsophagea, (Œsophag'itis).

CYNANCHE PRUNELLA, C. Tonsillaris—c. Purpuro-parotidea, Cynanche maligna—c. Simplex, Isthmitis—c. Stridula, C. trachealis.

CYNANCHE TONSILLARIS, Empres'ma Paristhm'is Tonsillar'is, Synan'che, Cynan'che faucium, Amygdal'itis, Branci, Bronchi, Hyen'che, Tonsill'is, Cynanche Prunel'la, Paristhm'is, Paristhm'is, Dysph'agia inflammato'ria, Antiad'itis, Angina inflammato'ria, A. cum tumore, A. tonsillar'is, A. Synocha'ris, A. Sanguin'ca, A. vera et legit'ima, Inflammatio Tonsillarum, Antiadon'tus inflammato'rius, Inflammato'ry Sore Throat, Common Squinancy, Squinasy or Quinsy, (F.) Amygdal'is, Inflammation des Amygdales, Angina tonsillaris, Pharyngite tonsillaire, Esquinancia, Squinancia, Catar'ris guttural, Angina gutturalis inflammato'ria. The characteristic symptoms of this affection are, swelling and florid redness of the mucous membrane of the fauces, and especially of the tonsils; painful and impeded deglutition, accompanied with inflammatory fever. It is generally ascribed to cold, and is one of the most common affections of cold and temperate climates. It usually goes off by resolution, but frequently ends in suppuration.

Common sore throat is an affection of no consequence. It requires merely rest, and the observance of the antiphlogistic regimen. When more violent—in addition to this,—bleeding, local or general, or both,—purgatives, inhalation of the steam of warm water; acid, or emollient gargles; rubefacients externally, or sinapiams or blisters. When suppuration must inevitably occur, the continued use of the inhaler must be advised, and an opening be made into the abscess as soon as it shall have formed. If the patient be likely to be suffocated by the tumefaction, bronchotomy may be necessary.

CYNANCHE TRACHEALIS; the Cynanche laryngea of some, Suffocatio strid'ula, Angina perniciosa, Asthma Infantum, Cynanche strid'ula, Catar'rhus suffocato'rius Barbado'n'sis, Angina polypo'sa sive membrana'tea sive pulpo'sa, Empres'ma Bronchi'is, E. Bronchiom'itis, Angina inflammato'ria, A. suffocato'ria, A. strepito'sa, Laryng'itis et Trachei'is infantilis, Laryng'o'taxis seu Laryngo-trachei'is, Laryngo-trachei'is with diphtheritic exudation, A. exudato'ria, Laryngod'acæ, Orthopnea cynan'chica, Cynancho'rhoptona'sa, Padan'choné, (1) A. Trache'lis, Morbus Strangulato'rius, Trachei'is, Trachei'is, Trachel'itis, Diphtheri'is trache'lis, Expectato'rio Sol'ida, Cauma Bronchi'is, Angina canina, Croup, Roup, Hives, Choak, Stuffing, Rising of the lights, (F.) Angina laryngis et trache'alis, Laryngitis avec production de fausses membranes, Laryngitis pseudo-membraneuse. A disease characterized by sonorous and suffocative breathing; harsh voice; cough, ringing or like the barking of a dog; fever, highly inflammatory. It is apt to be speedily attended with the formation of a false membrane, which lines the trachea beneath the glottis, and occasions violent dyspnoea and suffocation, but is sometimes expectorated. The dyspnoea, as in all other affections of the air-passages, has evident exacerbations. It differs in its character in different situations; being infinitely more inflammatory in some places than in others, and hence the success obtained by different modes of treatment. It chiefly affects children, and is apt to recur, but the subsequent attacks are usually less and less severe.

As a general principle, it requires the most active treatment; bleeding from the arm or neck, so as to induce paleness; leeches applied to the neck, &c., according to the age,—the warm bath, blisters to the neck or chest, and purgatives. Formidable as the disease may be, if this plan be followed early, it will generally be successful. Many specifics have been recommended for it, but the search has been idle and fruitless. The majority of cases of what are called croup are not of this inflammatory cast; but are more of a spasmodic character, and have been termed by the French faux croup, and with us are occasionally termed spasmodic croup. They generally yield to an emetic and the warm bath.

It may be the effect of acute or chronic inflammation of the internal ear, paralysis of the auditory nerve or its pulpy extremity, or of some mechanical obstruction to the sonorous rays. In most cases, however, the cause of the deafness is not appreciable, and the treatment has to be purely empirical. Syringing the ear, dropping in slightly stimulating oils, fumigations, &c., are the most likely means to afford relief.

DEAFNESS, TAYLOR'S REMEDY FOR, see Alium.

DEALBATIO, Paleness.

DEAMBULATIO, Walking.

Definitive cessation of all the functions, the aggregate of which constitute life. Real Death, Apothanasia, is distinguished from asphyxia or apparent death:—the latter being merely a suspension of those same functions. But it is often difficult to judge of such suspension, and the only certain sign of real death is the commencement of putrefaction. At times, therefore, great caution is requisite to avoid mistakes. Death is commonly preceded by some distressing symptoms, which depend on lesion of respiration, circulation, or of the cerebral function, and which constitute the agony. That which occurs suddenly, and without any, or with few, precursory signs, is called sudden death. It is ordinarily caused by disease of the heart; apoplexy; the rupture of an aneurism, or by some other organic affection. Death is natural, when it occurs as the result of disease: violent, when produced by some forcible agency. It may likewise affect the whole body, or a part only; hence the difference between somatic and molecular death.

The chief varieties of the modes of death may be thus given:—

Death beginning at the heart, { Suddenly—Syncope: Gradual—Asthénia.
 " " in the lungs—Asphyxia.
 " " in the brain—Apoplexy.
 " " in the gray matter of the { Paralysis of pneumogastrica, medulla, &c.
 " " in the blood—necræmia.

Debility may be real, or it may be apparent; and, in the management of disease, it is important to attend to this. At the commencement of fever, for example, there is often a degree of apparent debility, which prevents the use of appropriate means, and is the cause of much evil. Excitement is more dangerous than debility.

DÉBOITEMENT, Luxation.

of the prepuce is practised to put an end to the inflammation of the glans: in strangulated hernia, débridement of the abdominal ring is had recourse to, to remove the stricture of the intestine, &c.

DECIDUA, Decidua membrana.

DECID'UA MEMBRANA, Decid'ua, Decid'uous Membrana, from decidere, 'to fall off,' (de, and cado.) The outermost membrane of the fœtus in utero. Chaussier calls it Epichorion: by others, it has been called *Membra'na cadu'ca Hunt'eri, M. foeculent'ia, M. cellulosa, M. sinuosa, M. communis, M. præexistans, Decidua externa, Tunica exterior ovi, T. cadu'ca, T. crassa, Membra'na cribrosa, Membra'na ovi mater'na, M. muosa, Decidua spongiosa, Epione, Placenta uteri succenturiat'us, Subplacenta, Membra'na uteri interna evoluta, Nidamentum, Anhi'tous membrane, Chorion spongiosum, C. tomentosum, fungosum, reticulatum, &c., Tunica filamentosa, (F.) Membrane caduque, Epions, Pârions, Shaggy Chorion, Spongy Chorion, &c. Great diversity has prevailed, regarding this membrane and its reflected portion. It has been conceived by some that it exists before the germ arrives in the uterus,—as it has been met with in tubal and ovarian pregnancies; and that it is occasioned by a new action, assumed by the uterine vessels at the moment of conception. Chaussier, Lobstein, Gardien, Velpeau and others consider the decidua to be a sac, completely lining the uterus, and without apertures, and that when the ovum descends through the tube, it pushes the decidua before it, and becomes enveloped in it, except in the part destined to form the placenta. That portion of the membrane, which covers the ovum, forms the Membra'na decid'ua reflexa, (F.) M. caduque reflexa, according to them;—the part lining the uterus being the Decidua Uteri. Towards the end of the fourth month, the decidua reflexa disappears. The very existence of a Tunica decidua reflexa has, however, been denied. This membrane has received various names. Dr. Granville, regard-* ing it as the external membrane of the ovum, has termed it Cortex ovi. It has also been termed Involucrum membranae ovum, Membrana retiformis chorii, Membrana filamentosa, M. adventitia and M. crassa, Ovulina and Decidua protrusa. The decidua becomes thinner and thinner, until the end of gestation. Its use seems to be, to fix the ovum to the uterus, and to fulfil some important purposes in the nutrition of the fœtus. To the membrane which, according to Bojanus, is situated between the placenta and the uterus, and which he considers to be produced at a later period than the decidua vera, he gives the name membrana decidua sarotina.

DECIDUA PROTRUSA, Decidua reflexa.

DECIDUOUS MEMBRANE, Decidua membrana.

DECIGRAMME, Decigramma, from decimus, 'the tenth part,' and γραμμα, 'gramme.' The tenth part of the gramme in weight: equal to a little less than two grains, French; 1.544 Troy.

DECIMANA FEBRIS, from decem, 'ten.' An intermittent, whose paroxysms return every 10th day or every 9 days. It is supposititious.

DECLAMATION, Declamatio, from de, and clamare, 'to cry out.' The art of depicting the sentiments by inflections of the voice, accompanied with gestures, which render the meaning of the speaker more evident, and infuse into the minds of the auditors the emotions with which he is impressed. Declamation may become the cause of disease: the modification, produced in the pulmonary circulation,—accompanied by the great excitement, sometimes experienced,—is the cause of many morbid affections; particularly of pneumonia, hæmoptysis, and apoplexy. In moderation, it gives a healthy excitement to the frame.

DÉCLIN, Decline.

DECLINATIO, Decline.

DECLINE, Declinatio, Inclinatio, Decrementum, Remissio, Parasitio, Parasitismus, (F.) Déclin, from de, and clinare, 'to bend.' That period of a disorder or paroxysm, at which the symptoms begin to abate in violence. We speak, also, of the decline of life, or of the powers, (F.) Déclin de l'age, L'age de déclin, when the physical and moral faculties lose a little of their activity and energy. See Phthisis, and Tabes.

DÉCLIVE, (F.) Declivis, from de, 'from,' and divus, 'declivity.' Inclining downwards. This epithet is applied to the most depending part of a tumour or abscess.

DECOCTION, Decoctio, from decoquere, 'to boil' (de and coquere), Epspsis, Apoz'esis, Zosis, Heps'esis, Aphopsis, (F.) Décoction. The operation of boiling certain ingredients in a fluid, for the purpose of extracting the parts soluble at that temperature. Decoction, likewise, means the product of this operation, to which the terms Decoctionum, Zoma, Aphopsisma, Apozema, Hepsma, Chylus and Epspsma, have been applied according to ancient custom, in order to avoid any confusion between the operation and its product;—as preparatio is used for the act of preparing; preparatum, for the thing prepared.

DECURTA'TUS, αμυγος, or μυσοπιση, from de, and curtus, 'short,' 'shortened, curtailed,' 'running to a point.' When applied to the pulse, it signifies a progressive diminution in the strength of the arterial pulsations, which, at last, cease. DECUSSA'TION, Decussatio, Χιασμασ, Incruciatio, Intersectio, Intricatura, from decussis, that is, decem asses; also, the figure of the letter X. Union in the shape of an X or cross. Anatomists use this term chiefly in the case of the nerves—as the decussation of the optic nerves, which cross each other within the cranium.

DECUSSOR'IUM, from decutio, (de and quatio), 'I shake down.' An instrument used, by the ancients, for depressing the dura mater, and facilitating the exit of substances effused on or under that membrane. It is described by Scultetus, Paré, &c. See Meningophylax.

DEERBERRY, Gaultheria.

DEERFOOD, Brasenia hydropeltis.

DEFAILLANCE, Syncope.

DEFECA'TION, Defecatio, from de, and feces, 'excrements.' The feces generally accumulate in the colon, being prevented by the annulus at the top of the rectum from descending freely into that intestine. In producing evacuations, therefore, in obstinate constipation, it is well, by means of a long tube, to throw the injection up into the colon, as suggested by Dr. O'Beirne.

In Pharmacy, defecation means the separation of any substance from a liquid in which it may be suspended. See Clarification.

DEFLORA'TION, Defloratio, Devirginatio, Virginitas deflorata, from deflorescere, (de, and flouescere), 'to shed flowers.' The act of depriving a female of her virginity. Inspection of the parts is the chief criterion of defloration having been forcibly accomplished; yet inquiry must be made, whether the injury may not have been caused by another body than the male organ. Recent defloration is infinitely more easy of detection than where some time has elapsed.

DEGENERATIO, Degeneration—d. Adiposa Cordis, Steatosis cordis.

DEGENERAT'ION, Degeneratio, Nothensis, Nothia, from degener, 'unlike one's ancestors,' (de, and genus, 'family,') Degen'eracy, (F.) Abatardissement. A change for the worse in the intimate composition of the solids or fluids of the body. In pathological anatomy, degeneration means the change which occurs in the structure of an organ, when transformed into a matter essentially morbid; as a cancerous, or tubercular, degeneration.

Dégénérescence is, by the French pathologists, employed synonymously with Degeneration.

DÉGÉNÈRESCENCE, Degeneration—d. Graisceuse du Foie, Adiposis hepatica—d. Granulé du Rein, Kidney, Bright's disease of the—d. Noirs, Melanosis.

DEGLUTINATIO, Décollement.

DEGLUT'ION, Deglutition—d. Difficilis, Dysphagia—d. Impedita, Dyphagia—d. Læsa, Dysphagia.

DEGLUTIT'ION, Deglutitio, Cataporsis, from de and glutire, 'to swallow.' The act by which substances are passed from the mouth into the stomach, through the pharynx and œsophagus. It is one of a complicated character, and requires the aid of a considerable number of muscles; the first steps being voluntary, the remainder executed under spinal and involuntary nervous influence.

DEGMUS, Dexis, Morsus: (F.) Morsure,—a bite in general, from δaxvov, 'I bite.' A gnawing sensation about the upper orifice of the stomach, which was once attributed to acrimony of the liquids contained in that viscus.

DÉGORGEMENT, Disgorgement.

DÉGOUT, Disgust.

DEGREE, from degré, originally from gradus, 'a step.' Galen used this expression to indicate the qualities of certain drugs. Both he and his school admitted cold, warm, moist, and dry medicines, and four different 'degrees' of each of those qualities. Thus, Apium was warm in the first degree, Agrimony in the second, Roche Alum in the third, and Garlic in the fourth. Bedaga was cold in the first, the flower of the Pomegranate in the second, the Sempervivum in the third, Opium in the fourth, &c. The French use the term degré to indicate, 1. The intensity of an affection: as a burn of the first, second, third degrees, &c. 2. The particular stage of an incurable disease, as the third degree of phthisis, cancer of the stomach, &c.

DEGUSTATION, Degustatio, from de, and gustare, 'to taste.' Gustation. The appreciation of sapid qualities by the gustatory organs.

The expulsion of the feces;—Ejectio, Egestio. Also, a fecal discharge or stool,—generally, however, with alvina prefixed,—as an alvina Dejection, Alvus viridis, Dejectio alvina. Also, depression of spirits.

mination Deligatio'r Plaga'rura being synonymous with Medicus Vulnerarius, and in derivation, with the Wundarzt, 'wound physician' or surgeon, of the Germans. Deligation is hardly ever used now as an English word. In France, it is applied to the regular and methodical application of bandages, and to the ligation of arteries.

DELIGATURA, Deligation.

DELIQUESCENT, Deliquescens, from deliquescere, (de, and liquescere), 'to melt,' 'to dissolve.' Any salt which becomes liquid by attracting moisture from the air. The deliquescent salts require to be kept in bottles, well stopped. Chloride of lime, acetate of potassa, and carbonate of potassa, are examples of such salts. The ancient chemists expressed the condition of a body, which had become liquid in this manner, by the word Deliquium.

DELIRIUM, from de, 'from,' and lira, 'a ridge between two furrows.' Paracopte, Phrenitis, Phledonia, Desipientia, Aphrosyne, Paraleresma, Paraleresis, Paralogia, Phantasia, Paraphrosyne, Emotio, Leros, Paranosa, Allophasia, Deliratio, (F.) Délire, Égarément d'esprit, &c., Transport, Idiosynchysis. Straying from the rules of reason; wandering of the mind. Hippocrates used the word μανία, mania, for delirium sine febre, and the Greek words given above for delirium cum febre. In different authors, also, we find the words, Paraphora, Paraphrosis, Paraphrenesis, Paraphrenia, Phrenesis, Phrenetosis, &c., for different kinds of delirium. Delirium is usually symptomatic.

DELIRIUM EBRIOSITATIS, D. tremens—d. Epileptic, see Epilepsy—d. Furiosum, Mania—d. Maniacum, Mania—d. Potatorum, D. tremens—d. Tremifaciens, D. tremens.

A state of delirium and agitation, peculiar to those addicted to spirituous liquors, with great sleeplessness. It is preceded by indisposition, lassitude, watchfulness, headache, and anorexia, the delirium and tremors most commonly recurring in paroxysms. It is caused by the habitual and immoderate use of ardent spirits or of opium or tobacco; or rather by abandoning them after prolonged use. The treatment is various.

Many have regarded stimulants, with large doses of opium to induce rest, to be indispensable. It is certain, however, that the expectant system will often, if not generally, be successful; and, it is probable, a cure effected in this manner will be more permanent than when produced by excitants.

DELIRUS, Delirious.

DELITESCENCE, see Repercussion.

DELITESCENTIA, Repercussion.

DÉLIVRANCE, (F.) An expression, which, in common language, signifies the action of delivering, liberatio, but in the practice of obstetrics, means the extrusion of the secundines, either spontaneously or by the efforts of art. This completion of delivery—partus secundarius, secundinarum expulsio vel extractio, is produced by the same laws as the expulsion of the fœtus. Sometimes, the after-birth follows the child immediately; at others, it is retained; and requires manual interference to remove it. The following are the chief cases in which this becomes necessary. 1. Intimate adhesion between the placenta and paries of the uterus. 2. Spasmodic contraction of the orifice of the uterus. 3. Hour-glass contraction. 4. Torpor or hemorrhage after the expulsion of the child, and,—5. Insertion of the placenta at the orifice of the uterus.

DELPHINIUM STAPHISAGRIA. The systematic name of the Staves-acre, Staphisagria, Phleuroctonum, Phthorium, Staphis, Pedicularia, (F.) Staphisaigre, Herbe aux Poux, Dauphinelle. The seeds have a disagreeable smell; a nauseous, bitterish, hot taste; and are cathartic, emetic, and vermifuge; owing, however, to the violence of their operation, they are seldom given internally, and are chiefly used in powder, mixed with hair powder, to destroy lice. The active principle of this plant has been separated, and received the name Delphinia. It is extremely acrid, and has been recently used, like veratrin, in tic douloureux, paralysis and rheumatism. It is used in the form of ointment, or in solution in alcohol, (gr. x to xxx, or more, to ʒj.) applied externally.

DELPHYS, Uterus, Vulva.

DELTA, Vulva.

DELTIIFORMIS, Deltoid.

DELTOID, Deltoides, Delto'des, Deltoides, Deltiformis, from the Greek capital letter Δ, δέλτα, and ειδος, 'resemblance.' Sous-acromioclaviculaire of Dumas; sus-acromio-humeral of Chaussier. A triangular muscle forming the fleshy part of the shoulder, and covering the shoulder-joint. It extends from the outer third of the clavicle, from the acromion and spine of the scapula, to near the middle and outer part of the os humeri, where it is inserted by means of a strong tendon. This muscle raises the arm directly upwards, when the shoulder is fixed, and carries it anteriorly or posteriorly, according to the direction of the fibres, which are thrown into action. If the arm be rendered immovable, the deltoid acts inversely and depresses the shoulder.

DEM EL MUCA. A name given by Prosper Alpinus to a celebrated disease, which, he says, is proper to Egypt. He considers it to be inflammation of the brain; but others describe it as a pernicious intermittent.

DEMENCIA, Amentia, Fœvitas, Amentia, Ecna'a, Parana'a, Mo'ria demens, Noasthenia; Incoherency, Imbecility, Incoherent Insanity; from de, 'from,' or 'out of,' and mens, 'mind,' or 'reason.' (F.) Démence, Bétiis. In common parlance, and even in legal language; this word is synonymous with insanity. Physicians, however, have applied it to those cases of unsound mind which are characterized by a total loss of the faculty of thought, or by such an imbecility of intellect that the ideas are extremely incoherent, there being at the same time a total loss of the power of reasoning. Mania and melancholia are apt to end in this, if possible, more deplorable state. Dotage is the Dementia of the aged—Mo'ria demens lora'ma, Lora'ma, Lora'sis, Lorus, Deliratio Senum, Amentia Senilis, Puerilitas, Delirium Senile, Anilitas, Senile Insanity, Insanity of the aged,—a form of moral insanity, in which the whole moral character of the individual is changed.

DEMULCENTS, Demulcentia, Involventia, Obvolventia, Lubricantia, from demulcere, (de and mulcere), 'to sooth,' 'to assuage.' (F.) Adoucissants. Medicines supposed to be capable of correcting certain acrid conditions imagined to exist in the humours. Substances of a mucilaginous or saccharine nature belong to this class. Demulcents may act directly on the parts with which they come in contact; but in other cases, as in catarrh, their effect is produced by contiguous sympathy; the top of the larynx being soothed by them first, and indirectly the inflamed portion of the air-passages. In diseases of the urinary organs, they have no advantage over simple diluents.—See Diluents and Emollients. The following are the chief demulcents:—Acaciæ Gummi; Althææ Folia et Radix; Amygdala; Amylum; Avenæ Farina; Cera; Cetaceum; Cydoniæ Semina; Fucus Crispus; Glycyrrhiza; Hordeum; Lichen; Linum; Olivæ Oleum; Sassafras Medulla; Sesamum; Sevum; Tragacantha, and Ulmus.

A disease, which appeared in the years 1827 and 1828, in the West Indies, and in the southern states of North America. It was extremely violent in its symptoms, but not often fatal. It usually commenced with great languor, chilliness, and pain in the tendons about the smaller joints. To these symptoms succeeded burning heat and redness of the skin, pains in the muscles of the limbs or in the forehead, with vomiting or nausea. The fever continued for one, two or three days, and usually terminated by copious perspiration. In different places, it put on different appearances; but seems in all to have been a singular variety of rheumatic fever. The usual antiphlogistic treatment was adopted, and successfully.

Those of the upper incisors and canine are furnished by the infra-orbital nerve, a branch of the superior maxillary; and those of the molares by the trunk of the same nerve. The teeth of the lower jaw receive the nerves from the inferior maxillary, which, as well as the superior maxillary, arises from the 5th pair.

DENTAL PULP, Pulpa seu Nucleus seu Substantia pulposa dentis, Germen dentale, (F.) Pulpa dentaire. A pultaceous substance, of a reddish-gray colour, very soft and sensible, which fills the cavity of the teeth. It is well supplied with capillary vessels.

DENTITION, Denti'tio, Denti'tis, Odontophy'ia, Teething, Odontis'asia, Odonto'sis, from dentire, 'to breed teeth.' The exit of the teeth from the alveoli and gums; or rather the phenomena which characterize the different periods of their existence. The germs of the first teeth, dentes lac'tei or milk teeth, (F.) dens de lait, are visible in the fœtus about the end of the second month; and they begin to be ossified from the end of the third to that of the sixth month. At birth, the corona of the incisors is formed, but that of the canine is not completed; and the tubercles of the molares are not yet all united. Gradually the fang becomes developed; and at about 6 or 8 months begins what is commonly called, the first dentit'ion, Odontia dentitio'nis lactan'tium. The two middle incisors of the lower jaw commonly appear first; and, some time afterwards, those of the upper jaw; afterwards, the two lateral incisors of the lower jaw; and then those of the upper, followed by the four anterior molares: the canine or eye-tooth, at first, those of the lower, and afterwards, those of the upper jaw next appear; and, subsequently and successively, the first 4 molares—2 above and 2 below, 1 on each side. The whole number of the primary, temporary, deciduous, shedding, or milk-teeth, (dentes temporari'i.) (F.) Dents de lait, is now 20.

The second dentit'ion or shedding of the teeth, odontia dentitio'nis puer'ilis, begins about the age of 6 or 7. The germs or membranous follicles of these second teeth—to the number of 32—as well as the rudiments of the teeth themselves, are visible, even in the fœtus, with the exception of those of the small molares, which do not appear till after birth. They are contained in alveoli of the same shape as those of the first dentition. Their ossification commences at from 3 to 6 months after birth, in the incisors and first molares; at eight or nine months in the canine; about three years, in the molares, 3½ in the second great molares, and about 10 years in the last. As the alveolus of a new tooth becomes gradually augmented, the septum between it and that of the corresponding milk tooth is absorbed, and disappears. The root of the milk tooth is likewise absorbed; its corona becomes loose and falls out, and all the first teeth are gradually replaced by the permanent teeth, Dentes serot'ini. This second dentition becomes necessary in consequence of the increased size of the jaws. The new teeth have neither the same direction nor the same shape as the old; and they are more numerous; amounting till the age of 25 (sooner or later,) to 28. About this period, a small molaris appears at the extremity of each jaw, which is called Dens sapient'ia or wisdom tooth, Dens serot'inus, Dens sophroret'icus, D. sophronis'ta, D. saphr'm'iter, (F.) Arrêre-dent, Dent de sagasso, making the whole number of permanent teeth 32. During the period of dentition, that is, of the first dentition, the infant is especially liable to disease;—the irritation, produced by the pressure of the tooth on the superincumbent gum, sometimes occasioning pyrexia, convulsions, diarrhoea, &c., which symptoms are often strikingly relieved by a free division of the distended gum. This disordered condition is called Teething, Odon'tia dentitio'nis, Odont'iasis, Odontal'gia dentitio'nis, Odont'ismus.

A disease, characterized by great augmentation and often manifest alteration in the secretion of urine; with excessive thirst, and progressive emaciation. Cullen has described two species:—Diabetes insipidus and D. Mellitus, (F.)

Diabète faux ou insipide, Diabète; the former being, simply, a superabundant discharge of limpid urine, of its usual, urinary taste; the latter D. Mellitus, called, also, Pav'ris Mellit'a, Diabète An'glicus, D. vovus, Mellin'ria, Glycosu'ria, Glycyrrh'a urino'sa, Uran'ia mellit'is, Saccharorrh'a'a urino'sa, Phlébot'ia, Uroph-

The quantity of urine, discharged in the 24 hours, is sometimes excessive, amounting to 30 pints and upwards; and each pint containing sometimes  $\frac{1}{4}$  oz. of saccharine matter. This replaces the urea, which is not found in quantity in the urine of those labouring under diabetes. Where the disease is situate is not clear. The whole system of nutrition, however, seems to be morbidly implicated. A part of the urine must be formed at the expense of the system, as the egesta frequently far exceed the solid and liquid ingesta. On dissection, no morbid appearance is met with, sufficient to enable us to fix on the seat of this distressing affection.

All the remedies that have been tried have usually been found insufficient in D. Mellitus. D. insipidus, Hyperur'sis aquosa, Hydruria, Hydruria, Paruria incontinens aquosa, Diabets spurius, Urorrhœa, Ureal Diabetes, (F.) Polyuria, Hyperurorrhia, Diabets insipide, Faux diabets, which occurs in hysterical habits, and has, hence, been called D. hysteriense, is of comparatively trifling moment. Exclusive diet, and attention to the state of the cutaneous transpiration, which have sometimes produced good effects in D. Mellitus, have most commonly failed.

A disease characterized by frequent liquid alvine evacuations, and generally owing to inflammation or irritation of the mucous membrane of the intestines. It is commonly caused by errors in regimen, the use of food noxious by its quality or quantity, &c., constituting the Diarrhœa ataractaria, D. Crapulosa of writers. It may be acute or chronic. Many varieties have been made by some nosologists—e. g. mucous,—Diarrhœa viscosa, Blennorrhœa, Blennorrhœa; bilious,—Iso-cholœsis, Diarrhœa bilidœsis; serous,—Hydrochœsis, Hydrodiarrhœa, Orrhœichœsis; dependent upon the matters evacuated. Diarrhœa requires different treatment, according to its nature. If caused, as it often is, by improper matters in the intestinal canal, these must be evacuated; and the astringent plan of treatment must not be adopted, unless the discharges seem kept up by irritability of the intestines, or unless they are colligative. The indiscriminate use of astringents is to be deprecated.

A very fatal diarrhœa prevails amongst the native inhabitants of India, to which Mr. Tytler has given the name Diarrhœa hæctica, because, like hæctic fever, it seems to obtain habitual possession of the constitution, to operate upon it with scarcely any perceptible intermission, and, in general, to defy the most powerful remedies.

DICEPHALUS, Biceph'alus, Derod'ymus et Iod'ymus, Janus, from δι, 'double,' and κεφαλη, 'head.' A monster with two heads.

DICERAS RUDE, Ditrachyceras rudis, see Worms.

DICHAL'CON. A weight, equal to a third part of the obolus.

DICHOPHYIA, from διχα, 'double,' and φυω, 'I grow.' A disease of the hairs, in which they split and grow forked.

DICHROMOS, Verbena officinalis.

DICIATRIA, Medicine, legal.

DICLIDOSTOSIS, from διχλις, 'a double door,' and στρον, 'ossification.' Ossification of valves—as of the heart.

DICLIS, Valve.

DICORYPHUS, Dicranus: from δι, 'double,' and κερυον, 'the crown of the head.' A monster with a double vertex or cranium.

DICORYPHUS DIHYPOGASTRIUS, Hemipages.

DICRANUS, Dicoryphus.

DICROTUS, Bisfor'ions, from δις, 'twice,' and στρον, 'I strike.' An epithet given to the pulse, when it seems to beat twice as fast as usual. It is synonymous with the term, rebounding pulse,—the artery rebounding after striking, so as to convey the sensation of a double pulsation. It has been considered, and with truth, to frequently foretell hemorrhage. In bad cases of typhus, it certainly announces such a tendency.

DICTAMNE, Dictamnus albus—d. de Crète, Origanum dictamnus.

DICTAMNUS ALBUS; from Dictamnus, a town in Crete; White Frazinella, or Bastard Dittany, Frazinella, (F.) Dictamnus, Frazinelle. The fresh root has been considered nervine, anthelminthic, and emmenagogue. It is not used.

DICTAMNUS CRETIUS, Origanum dictamnus.

DICTYITIS, Retinitis.

DICTYON, Rete.

DIDELPHYS, Dihysteria.

DIDYMAL'GIA, from διδυμοι, 'the testicles,' and αλγος, 'pain.' Pain in the testicles.

DIDYMIS, Epididymis.

DIDYMITIS, Hernia humoralis.

DIDYMOS, Gemellus.

DIDYMUS, Testicle—d. Symphyogastrius, Gastrodidymus—d. Symphyohypogastrius, Hypogastrodidymus—d. Symphyopieræus, Pygoidymus—d. Symphyothoracogastrius, Thoracogastrodidymus.

DIECBOL'ION, from δια, and εβαλλω, 'I cast out.' A name given, by the ancients, to a remedy which they believed capable of producing abortion.

DIERENBACH, MINERAL WATERS OF. Dierenbach is a city in Bavaria, two leagues from which is a sulphurous spring.

DIES, Hæmera. A day. (F.) Jour. The day is, properly, the period during which the solar light illumines our horizon: but commonly, also, we designate by the word day the period of 24 hours or Nyctæmeron, which is frequently divided into four parts—morning, midday, evening, and midnight. In antiquity, great importance was attached to the observation of days in disease. The medical day is usually reckoned at 24 hours; universally in estimating the duration of a disease. In parts of the United States, it comprises only the time when the sun is above the horizon, as regards the administration of medicine. If a medicine be ordered to be taken four times a day, it is understood to mean during the 12 hours of day.

DIES CANICULARES, see Canicula—d. Contemplabiles, Critical days—d. Contemplantes, Indicating days—d. Critici, Critical days—d. Decretorii, Critical days—d. Indicantes, Indicating days—d. Indicatorii, Indicating days—d. Indices, Indicating days—d. Internuntii, Critical days—d. Indicatorii, Critical days—d. Radicales, Critical days.

DIET, Dia'ta, Diæ'ta, Ra'tio victæ. Originally, this word signified nearly the same thing as Hygiene and Regimen, that is, Diet was the employment of every thing necessary for the preservation of health and life. At the present day, it signifies a particular kind of food, and, at times, a privation of food and drink;—abstinence. To put any one upon diet, (F.) Mettre quelqu'un à la diète, means to deprive him of his usual nourishment:—milk diet, means a diet of milk, &c. See Aliment, Dietetics, Hygiene, and Regimen.

DIET SCALE. Every well regulated hospital has certain dietetic regulations. The following Table of Dietary shows the particular regimen selected for the sick, in certain hospitals.

The Diet Scale of the British Navy allows from 31 to 35½ ounces of dry nutritious matter daily; of which 26 ounces are vegetable, and the rest animal—9 ounces of salt meat, or 4½ ounces of fresh.

That of the Navy of the United States is as follows:—Three days in the week—Pork, 16 oz.; beans or peas, 7 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.; sugar, 2 oz.; tea, ¼ oz.;—40½ oz. Two days in the week—Beef, 16 oz.; flour, 8 oz.; fruit, dried, 4 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; tea and sugar, 2½ oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.;—45½ oz. Two days in the week—Beef, 16 oz.; rice, 8 oz.; butter, 2 oz.; cheese, 2 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; tea and sugar, 2½ oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.;—45½ oz.

In the Edinburgh workhouse the total allowance of dry food is about 17 ounces—13 ounces vegetable, and 4 ounces animal. In the Edinburgh children's poor house, the diet consists of milk and porridge, barley broth and bread, amounting to 13 ounces of vegetable food to 3 ounces of animal. These allowances have been found ample for the maintenance of health. Perhaps the case of the smallest quantity of food on which life was vigorously supported was that of Cornaro,—not more than 12 ounces a day, chiefly of vegetable matter, for a period of 58 years.

DIET DRINK. A decoction or potion, variously composed, and used in considerable quantity, for the purpose of purifying the blood. The Decoctum Lussitanicum or Lebon Diet-drink, is one of the most celebrated. See Decoctum Sarsaparilla Compositum.

DIETETICS, Dieteticæ, Diætetica, Medicinæ Diæteticæ; same etymon. (F.) Diētēsisque. A branch of medicine, comprising the rules to be followed for preventing, relieving, or curing diseases by diet. Dietetics is diet administered according to principle. It is an important part of Hygiene, (which see.) A well regulated system of diet has great power in checking disease, and likewise in preventing it. A proper knowledge of dietetics is, indeed, as important as that of the Materia Medica, strictly so called.

Dietetics has been used, also, synonymously with Hygiene.

DIETÉTIQUE, Dietetics.

DIETETISTS, Diætētistæ. Physicians who apply only the rules of dietetics to the treatment of disease.

DIEU-LE-FILT, MINERAL WATERS OF. The waters of Dieu-le-filt, in France, are chalybeate, and much sought after.

DIEURYSMUS, Dilatation.

DIEX'ODOS, from δία, and ὄδος, 'an exit or way out.' D'odos. Any opening, by which an excretion takes place.

DIFFERENTIAL DIAGNOSIS, see Dia-critica signa.

DIFICULTAS INTESTINORUM, Dysentery.

DIFFLATIO, Perspiration.

DIFFORMITÆ, Deformation.

DIFFUSIBLE, (stimulants) from diffundere, (dis and fundere, fundum, 'to pour,') 'to pour apart or abroad.' Those stimulating medicines which augment the action of the vascular and nervous systems in an acute but transitory manner.

DIGASTRICUS, from dis, 'twice,' and γαστήρ, 'a belly:' Biven'ter, B. Maxill'æ, Depri-mens Maxillæ Biven'ter, Bigaster, (F.) Mastoidohyogénien, Mastoido-génien—(Ch.), Digastrique, Abaisseur de la mâchoire inférieure. The name Digastrius, was formerly given to several muscles. It is now restricted to one of the muscles of the superior hyoid region. The digastrius is thick and fleshy at its extremities; thin and tendinous at its middle. It is attached to the mastoid groove of the temporal bone, and to a fessette at the side of the symphysis menti. Its tendon passes through an aponeurotic ring, which is attached to the os hyoides.

The use of the digastrius is to depress the lower jaw, or to raise the os hyoides, and to carry it forwards or backwards, as in deglutition.

The strong double-bellied muscle, which forms the gizzard of birds, is also called Digastrius.

DIGASTRICUS CRANII, Occipito-frontalis.

DIGASTRIQUE, Digastrius.

DIGERENTIA, Digestives.

DIGESTIBLE, Concoctis habitis. Capable of being digested. All food is not equally digestible, and some of the most nourishing is the least so—the fat of meat, for example. Certain substances again are entirely rebellious. The following table exhibits the time required for the stomachal digestion of different alimentary substances, in a well-known case, which fell under the care of Dr. Beaumont. The table is extracted from the Author's Human Health, Philadelphia, 1844. The most digestible substances are taken as the standard, which has been arbitrarily fixed at 1,000; and accordingly, aponeurosis, the first article in the table, requiring 3 hours, whilst pigs' feet soured, rice, &c. require but one, its digestibility, compared with that of these aliments, is as 333 to 1000; and so of the others. It need scarcely be said, that all these tabular results apply, in strictness, to the individual concerned only; yet they afford useful comparative views, which with exceptions depending upon individual peculiarities, may be regarded as approximations, applicable to mankind in general.

* Pigs' feet soured, rice, and tripe soured, being the most digestible articles in the table, are estimated at 1000. † In the case of oils, and other substances of similar nature, which undergo little digestion in the stomach, the time merely indicates the period that elapses before they are sent into the duodenum.

DIGESTIO DEPRAVATA, Dyspepsia—d. Difficilis, Dyspepsia—d. Laesa, Dyspepsia. DIGESTION, Digestio, from digere, 'to dissolve.' Cocctio, C. Ciborum, Pepsia. Digestion is a function, by means of which alimentary substances, when introduced into the digestive canal, undergo different alterations. The object of this is to convert them into two parts; the one, a reparatory juice, destined to renew the perpetual waste occurring in the economy; the other, deprived of its nutritious properties, to be rejected from the body. This function is composed of a series of organic actions, differing according to the particular organization of the animal. In man they are eight in number, viz. 1. Prehension of food.

2. Mastication. 3. Insalivation. 4. Deglutition. 5. Action of the stomach. 6. Action of the small intestine. 7. Action of the large intestine. 8. Expulsion of the feces.

DIGESTION is also a pharmaceutical operation, which consists in treating certain solid substances with water, alcohol, or other menstruum, at a slightly elevated temperature; for example, in a sand-bath, or by leaving them exposed for some time to the sun.

DIGESTIVE TUBE, Canal, alimentary.

DIGESTIVES, Digestiva, Digerentia; same etymon. (F.) Digestifs. A term given, by surgeons, to those substances, which, when applied to a wound or ulcer, promote suppuration; such as the ceratum resinæ, worm cataplasms, fomentations, &c. Dr. Paris uses the term Digestive Texture for the particular organic condition of substances which affects their digestibility.

DIGITAL, Digitalis; from digitus, 'a finger' having the shape of a finger, digitated; or belonging to the fingers.

The Appendix vermiformis cæci is sometimes called DIGITAL APPENDIX.

DIGITAL ARTERIES, VEINS, and NERVES are those distributed to the fingers.

DIGITAL BLANC, Clavaria.

DIGITAL CAVITY, Acycroid cavity, Cornu descensu ventriculi lateralis, (q. v.) The occipital portion of the lateral ventricle of the brain.

DIGITAL HUMAIN, Clavaria.

DIGITAL IMPRESSIONS are the slight impressions observable on the inner surface of the bones of the cranium, which correspond to the cerebral convolutions.

DIGITALE. Same etymon. (F.) Doigtier. A finger stall. The term Doigtier d'Asdrubali has been given to a small iron instrument used for measuring the dimensions of the pelvis. Placed at the end of the index finger, it adds to its length and enables it to reach the promontory of the sacrum.

DIGITALINE, see Digitalis.

DIGITALIS, from digitus, 'a finger,' because its flower represents a finger; Digitalis purpurea, Fox-glove, Baccharis, Bacchar, Baccar (?); Family, Scrophularinæ. Ses. Syst. Didymia Angiospermia; (F.) Digitale, Gants de notre dame, Doigtier. The leaves of this plant, which are indigenous in Great Britain, are powerfully sedative, (diminishing the velocity of the pulse,) diuretic, and sorbifacient. In over-doses, Digitalis causes vomiting, purging, dimness of sight, vertigo, delirium, hicough, convulsions, and death:—all the symptoms, in short, which characterize the acro-narcotic class of poisons. Its active principle has been called Digitaline. It is a hundred-fold stronger than the most active preparation of digitalis.

Digitalis has been administered in inflammatory diseases, phthisis, active hemorrhage, dropsy, &c.; but although it is a powerful remedy, it has not been as much employed as it probably would have been in particular cases, owing to the over-strained eulogiums, which many have passed upon it in almost all diseases. The average dose is one grain, in the form of pill, which may be repeated every six or eight hours.

DIGITALIS MINIMA, Gratiola officinalis.

DIGITATION, Digitatio, Productio den-

tata, Inseritio denticulata, I. digitata. A division, in the form of a finger. Several muscles, as the arrati, exhibit digitations, similar to those which the fingers form, when held separate.

DIGITATIONES TUBARUM FALLOPII, see Tube, Fallopiian.

DIGIT'IUM. Desiccation or atrophy of the fingers.—Linnæus. Sauvages calls the same affection Paronychia Digit'ium.

There are five on each hand: the first, or the thumb, Anticoeur, Pollex, Manus parva majori adju'tria, Dig'itus primus, D. magnus, Pro'manus, (F.) Pouce; the second, the index; the third, D. medius, Imp'udicus, (F.) Doigt du milieu, middle finger or long finger; the fourth, the ring finger, annula'ris, Param'osus, (F.) Annulaire; and the little finger, Oti'tes, Dig'itus auricularis, (F.) Auriculaire, Petit doigt. All of these have three phalanges, except the first, which has only two.

In Surgery, it means the accidental or preternatural augmentation of a canal or opening; as in aneurisms, varices, &c., or the process of enlarging any aperture or canal. When used so as to obtain a view of parts, as by the speculum, it is termed Dioptris'mus.

DILATING AGENTS, Dilatantia, (F.) Dilatants. Certain substances used in surgery, either to keep parts separate which have a tendency to unite—as after opening an abscess, to prevent the edges of the incision from uniting; or to increase and dilate openings of canals, either when natural, or formed accidentally or artificially. These agents differ from each other: the chief are—prepared sponge tents, gentian root, bougies, sounds, dried peas for issues, &c.

DILATOR, Dilatatorium, (F.) Dilatateur. An instrument, used for dilating a wound, excretory canal, or other natural or artificial opening. When employed to obtain an inspection of internal parts, it is termed Speculum, Dioptra, or Dioptron. There are several instruments of this kind, each taking its name from the part to which it is applied; as Speculum Oris, S. Nasi, S. Uteri, &c.

DILATOR, ARNOTT'S. A modification of the old dilators for strictures of the urethra. It consists of a tube of oiled silk; lined with the thin gut of some small animal to make it airtight, and fixed on the extremity of a small canula, by which it is distended with air or water, from a bag or syringe at the outer end, whilst a stop-cock or valve serves to keep the air or water in, when received. As soon as the bag is passed within the stricture or strictures, as much air is to be injected into it as the patient can easily bear. The instrument is not much used.

DILATORES ALARUM NASI, Compressor naris.

DILL, Anethum graveolens.

DILLY, Anthemis cotula.

DILUENTIA, from diluo (dis, and luere), 'I wash away.' (F.) Diluants. Medicines which have been conceived proper for augmenting the fluidity of the blood and other animal liquids. All aqueous drinks are diluents. They are administered, with great advantage, in various diseases. In fever, water, which is the most familiar diluent, may be freely allowed; the only precaution being to give it hot in the cold stage, cold in the hot, and tepid in the sweating. In diseases, where it is considered necessary to abstract blood largely, diluents should not be given too freely. The abstraction of blood occasions activity of absorption, and the mass is speedily restored. In cases of inflammation of the mammæ, in nurses, it is also obvious, that diluents should not be freely allowed, as they increase the secretion of milk, and add to the irritation. When demulcents are exhibited in cases of urinary disease, they act simply as diluents: their mucilaginous portion is digested in the stomach and small intestine,—the watery portion alone being separated by the kidney.

DILWEED, Anthemis cotula.

It is the antithesis to symptosis. See Intumescence.

In testing them with water, for the purpose of seeing whether the lungs are specifically heavier or lighter than that fluid. This is called Docimasia Pulmonum hydrostat'ica or the Hydrostatic

Test. If lighter, it would be some evidence that the fetus had respired: 2. In comparing the weight of the lungs with that of the whole body; the weight of lungs in which respiration has taken place being nearly twice as great. This is Docimasia Pulmonum Statica, or Plouquet's Test: and, 3. By measuring the circumference of the thorax and lungs; and comparing their dimensions with those of an infant which has not respired. This is Dansol's Test. dogstar, Canicula, Zenois, Sirius—a very brilliant star in the constellation of the great dog, which rises and sets, at this time, with the sun. It was formerly believed to be a period particularly unpropitious to health; that it was dangerous to purge during it; and other phantasies were indulged in regard to it.

DOGGRASS, Triticum repens.

DOGMAT'IC, from the Greek δωγμα, from δωκεν, 'I think.' Dogmaticus. The name of an ancient medical sect; so called, because its members endeavoured, by reasoning, to discover the essence of diseases and their occult causes; whilst the Empirics, their rivals, confined themselves strictly to experience; i. e., to the observation of facts. The union of the two modes of investigation makes the rational physician. These sectarians are likewise called Dogmatists, and their doctrine Dogmatism. The founders of this sect were Hippocrates, Thessalus, Draco, and Polybius; and the most celebrated of its supporters were Diocles of Carysta, Praxagoras of Cos, Chrysippus of Soli, Herophilus, Erasistratus, &c.

DOLAFRA, Aecia, Dolours.

DOL'ICHOS, from δολιχος, 'long.' A genus of plants of the leguminous family. It includes a number of species, generally indigenous in India or America. The Dol'ichos Lablab, or Lablab, is found in Egypt. (Prospero Alpini.) Its fruit is eaten there, like the haricot with us. The Dol'ichos Sinen'sis, is eaten in China, and is stored up as a provision for long voyages. The Dol'ichos Tuberosus, (F.) Pois Patate of Martinique, has tuberous roots of the size of both fists, and has the consistence and taste of the turnip. The Dol'ichos Bulbosus of the West Indies resembles the turnip;—and from the Dol'ichos Soja, the Japanese prepare the well-known sauce Soy, which they term Sooja. The most important in medicine, is the

DOL'ICHOS PRURIENS, Dol'ichos Stizolobium, Mucuna pruriens, Cowhage, Cowitch, Adarsia Pala. Ord. Leguminosæ. (F.) Pois à gratter. They excite an intolerable, prurient sensation when applied to the skin; but do not irritate the mucous membrane over which they pass, when administered internally. The Dolichos is a mechanical anthelmintic, and is useful in cases of ascarides lumbricoides, and oxyures vesiculosus. Dose, gr. v, to x, of the pbes, in molasses.

DOMESTIC, Domesticus, from domus, 'a house.' The term Domestic or Popular Medicines, has been given to treatises written for the purpose of enabling those who are not of the profession to treat diseases, which may occur in their families, without the necessity of calling in a physician. The term, likewise, signifies—Medicine, when thus practised. It is probable, that such works have been attended with more mischievous than advantageous results.

DORYCIMUM, Costus creticus.

DOS, Dorsum.

DOSE, Dosis, Præbium. The quantity of any substance, which ought to form part of a compound medicine, or ought to be exhibited singly, to produce a desired effect. Many circumstances influence the doses of medicine. Women require smaller doses, as a general principle, than men. Habit has a great effect, as well as climate, age, idiosyncrasy: all these, and other circumstances, must be taken into account; and every general rule on the subject will be found to have numerous exceptions. Some of the mechanical physicians laid it down as a rule, that the doses of medicines must always be as the square of the constitution! A matter not easy of calculation.

The following Tables will exhibit an approximation to the proper doses (according to age) of most substances.

TABLE OF DOSES ACCORDING TO AGE.

Age	Let the full dose be
24	will require	3-3ds.	1 drachm.
18	"	half.	2 scruples.
14	"	1-3d.	½ drachm.
4	"	1-4th.	1 scruple.
3	"	1-6th.	15 grains.
4	"	1-6th.	10 grains.
2	"	1-8th.	8 grains.
1	"	1-12th.	5 grains.

The table of doses, recommended by Dr. Thomas Young, according to age, differs in some respects from the above. Either affords a sufficient general approximation. His rule is, that

For children, under twelve years of age, the doses of most medicines must be diminished in the proportion of the age to the age increased by twelve:

thus, at two years, to 1-7th; i. e., 1-7 =  $\frac{2}{2+12}$

At twenty-one the full dose is given.

DOSES, BROKEN. When an agent is given in small portions it is said to be in broken doses,—refractis dosibus.

DOUCE AMÈRE, Solanum dulcamara.

DOUCHE, (F.) In Italian doccia; modern Latin, ducia; Cataclysmus, Douss. This term is applied to the shock of a column of fluid, of a determinate nature and temperature, let fall upon the body. Pumping is a variety of the Douche. In using this kind of bath, the fluid is directed upon the part on which we are desirous of acting. The douches descendantes are those in which the fluid falls from a height,—the douches ascendantes, those administered in diseases of the uterus,—the douches horizontales, where the fluid is impelled horizontally, &c. They may be cold or warm, according to circumstances. The apparatus consists of a reservoir of water having a pipe or plug, by means of which the water can be directed as the practitioner may desire. The Douche communicates a considerable and peculiar shock to the nervous system; and is one of the most successful means for taming the furious maniac. It is, also, useful in chronic rheumatism, stiff joints, &c.

Douches of air are, also, occasionally used, as in cases of obstruction of the Eustachian tube by mucus. The Douches are sent from an air-press—of which Deleau and Kramer have invented one each—through a catheter introduced through the nose into the tube.

Ord.* Aroidæ. Sez. Syst. Tetrandia Monogynia. This indigenous plant, as some of its names import, is extremely fetid. The property on which its medical virtues are dependent, resides in a volatile principle, which is impaired by long keeping, especially in powder. Dose; of the dried root, Dracontium, (Ph. U. S.), ten to twenty grains. It resembles asafetida and other fetid gums in its properties; in other words, belongs to the class of reputed antispasmodics.

The Guinea Worm, (F.) Dragonneau, Ver de Guinée, Ver Filaire, V. de Médine, V. cutané, Vena de Médine. A genus of worms, frequently met with in Indian and African climes. They are characterized by a filiform body, and are smooth and nearly of equal thickness throughout. The Guinea worm, when small, insinuates itself through the cutaneous pores, and penetrates into the cellular membrane and between the muscles; especially between those of the lower limbs, where it occasions a tumour like a boil, which subsequently suppurates, and the head of the worm appears and emerges gradually. The head must then be seized, and the worm be cautiously rolled round a small cylinder of linen or other substance. Care must be taken not to break it, as great pain and obstinate suppuration might be the consequence.

Considerable obscurity rests on this subject. Some even deny that the cases of Dracunculus, on record, are really those of worms.

DRAINING, Desiccatio, (F.) Dessèchement.

The act of drawing off the water from marshes, for the purpose of destroying the unhealthy emanations which proceed from them. It is a well known fact, that from marshes arise certain emanations or miasmata, with the nature of which we are, however, totally unacquainted, but which are the fertile source of intermittents and other diseases. Draining the soil and converting it into arable land changes its character, and the malaria ceases to be given off. It has happened, however, that although in some such situations intermittents have been got rid of, consumptions have taken their place.

DRAKENA, Dorstenia contrayerva.

The necessity for its use is indicated by the sensation of thirst. Fluid, taken during a meal, aids in the digestion of the food. Some drinks are exciting and tonic, as the different varieties of beer, wine, and spirits, which we use at table. In a therapeutical point of view, drinks are used to appease the thirst which prevails in febrile affections, or to act as diluents in those and other cases.

Ec'physis seu Appen'dix seu Process'us Ventrículi, Portonarium, Dodecadactylon, from δωδεκα, 'twelve,' and δακτυλος, 'a finger.' The duodenum is the first part of the intestinal canal, commencing at the pyloric orifice of the stomach, and terminating in the jejunum. Its length is about 12 fingers' breadth, and as it is only partially covered by the peritoneum, it is susceptible of considerable dilatation; hence its name Ventriculus succenturiatus. DYNAMIS, Faculty, Force.

DYNAMOMETEK, Myodynamiom'eter, Myodynamom'eter, from δυναμις, 'force,' 'vital power,' and μετρον, 'measure.' An instrument, contrived by M. Regnier, for measuring the comparative muscular strength of man and animals. It consists of a spring, which, when pressed upon, causes a needle to move upon a portion of a circle, furnished with a scale of kilogrammes and one of myriagrammes. To measure the strength of the hands, the two branches of the spring are firmly grasped, and brought as near together as the force can carry them. This effort makes the needle traverse, and indicates, on the scale of kilogrammes, the strength of the experimenter's hands. A man, 25 or 30 years of age, exerts a force commonly equal to 50 kilogrammes or 100 pounds.

The strength of the loins of a man, about 30 years of age, as indicated by this instrument, is usually about 13 myriagrammes, or 265 pounds, which shows the weight he is capable of raising.

From experiments made by Peron, in his voyage, on 12 individuals of Van Dieman's Land, 17 of New Holland, 56 of the Island of Timor, 17 Frenchmen belonging to the expedition, and 14 Englishmen in the colony of New South Wales, he found their comparative strength, indicated by the dynamometer, to be as follows:

NATIVES OF	STRENGTH
	of the arm.		of the loins.
	Kilog.	lbs.	Myri.	lbs.
1. Van Dieman's Land.	50.6	101.2
2. New Holland.	50.8	101.6	10.2	208.08
3. Timor.	54.7	117.4	11.6	238.64
4. France.	69.2	139.4	15.2	310.08
5. England.	71.4	142.4	15.2	332.52

DYNAMOMETER OR DYNAMETER, MEDIC'INAL. An instrument, invented by Dr. Paris, for the purpose of showing the quantity of active matter contained in a given weight or measure of any officinal compound, with the dose of any preparation, which will be equivalent in strength to a given quantity of any other of the same class. The instrument is more ingenious than useful.

Inflammation of the mucous membrane of the large intestine; the chief symptoms of which are:—fever, more or less inflammatory, with frequent mucous or bloody evacuations; violent tormina and tenesmus. When the evacuations do not contain blood, it has been called Dysenter'ia alba or simple Dysentery. The seat of the disease is, generally, in the colon and rectum. It occurs, particularly, during the summer and autumnal months, and in hot climates more than in cold: frequently, also, in camps and prisons, in consequence of impure air, and imperfect nourishment: and is often epidemic. Sporadic cases of dysentery are, generally, easily managed; but when the disease occurs epidemically, it often exhibits great malignancy. Generally, it yields to mild laxatives, as castor oil, combined with diaphoretic narcotics, such as the pulvis ipecacuanhæ compos'itus, and counter-irritants to the abdomen; but, at times, the inflammation runs on so speedily to ulceration, that, unless a new action be rapidly excited, death will be the consequence. In such cases, mercury must be rapidly introduced into the system, and narcotics may be combined with it. The whole management in acute dysentery must, of course, be strictly antiphlogistic.

Dysmenorrhœa, Menstruation difficile, Règles difficiles, Strangurie menstruelle.* Catamenia passed with great local pain, especially in the loins:—with sometimes a membranous discharge. Dysmenorrhœa is very difficult of removal, and prevents conception. In the married female, if she should be able to pass one period without pain, and subsequently become pregnant, the morbid action may be broken in upon, by gestation, and a perfect cure be obtained. Change of air, soon after marriage, will sometimes give occasion to this desirable result. The affection generally depends upon subinflammation of the interior of the uterus, called into action at each catamenial period. The violence of the pain requires the liberal use of narcotics.

chi resolutio, Cruditatis, Passio stomachica, Indigestion, Difficulty of Digestion. A state of the stomach, in which its functions are disturbed, without the presence of other diseases, or when, if other diseases be present, they are of but minor importance. The symptoms of dyspepsia are very various. Those affecting the stomach itself are:—loss of appetite; nausea; pain in the epigastrium or hypochondrium; heart-burn; sense of fullness, or weight in the stomach; acrid or fetid eructations; pyrosis, and sense of fluttering or sinking at the pit of the stomach. The sympathetic affections are of the most diversified character. Dyspepsia, being generally of a functional nature, is devoid of danger. When arising from disease of the stomach itself, it is, of course more serious.

It is usually dependent on irregularity of living; either in the quantity or quality of the food taken; and the most successful treatment is, to put the patient on a diet easy of digestion; to combat the causes, where such are apparent; and, by proper remedies and regimen, to strengthen the system in every practicable manner. A great error exists in regarding it as always a disease of debility. It is often connected with an inflammatory or subinflammatory condition of the mucous lining of the stomach, and of course a very different plan of treatment is required in the two cases. Dyspepsia is often attended with too great a secretion of the gastric acids; but, on other occasions, they would appear to be too small in quantity, so as to constitute alkaline indigestion or neutral indigestion.

Dysphagia is almost always symptomatic; either of inflammation or of other disease of the organs of deglutition, or of incomplete obstruction of the œsophagus, by some obstacle within it, or by a neighbouring tumour. EAR, Auris, Ous, ouc, Saxon, earg, (F.) Oreille. The organ of audition, Acouë. It is composed of a series of more or less irregular cavities, in which the sonorous rays are successively received and reflected, until they agitate the nerves which are destined to convey the impression to the brain. The ear is contained partly in the substance of the temporal bones; and a part projects externally, behind the joint of the lower jaw. It may be divided into three portions;—the outer or external ear, formed by the auricle and meatus auditorius; the middle ear, comprising the cavity of the tympanum and its dependencies; and the internal ear, comprehending the three semicircular canals, the cochlea and the vestibule; which, together, constitute the osseous labyrinth. Within the cavity of this labyrinth are contained membranes having nearly the shape of the vestibule and semicircular canals, but not extending into the cochlea. These membranes form the membranous labyrinth. Between the osseous and the membranous labyrinth is situate the liquor of Cotunnus, and within the membranous labyrinth is a fluid, termed by De Blainville vitæ auditivæ, from its supposed analogy to the vitreous humour of the eye. The form of the membranous vestibule is not an exact imitation of the osseous cavity, being composed of two distinct sacs, which open into each other,—the one termed the Sacculus vestibuli; the other Sacculus (q. v.) Each sac contains in its interior a small mass of white calcareous matter resembling powdered chalk, which seems to be suspended in the fluid of the sacs by means of a number of nervous filaments proceeding from the auditory nerve. These are the otoconies and otoliths of Breschet.

The auditory nerve is distributed to the cavities of the internal ear.

It is, commonly, a kind of cone, formed of silver, tin, or elastic gum, the base of which is turned towards the person who is speaking, and the apex placed in the entrance of the meatus auditorius externus.

It occurs during den-tition, and even afterwards, and the discharge is so profuse, that the head appears as if dipped in some glutinous liquid. By and by, the secretion dries into crusts and mats the hair into little separate tufts. The scalp gives evidence of inflammatory excitement, and the lymphatic ganglions of the neck are apt to become in-flamed and suppurate.

The voice, which strikes the ear through the cylinder, is more sharp and harsh than usual, and tremulous and broken like that of the goat. The patient himself is called Égophone. Bouillaud affirms that the "bronchial and bleating voice," (égobronchophonie) is the principal symptom of pleuropneumonia. Egophony exists, however, in cases of hepatisation where there is no pleural disease.

It has been occasionally employed with success in paralysis, rheumatism, accidental deafness, amaurosis, amenorrhœa, &c., but it is uncertain, and not much used; and the cases are by no means clear in which it could be of service. It may be communicated by means of the electric bath—Bain électrique, as it has been called; which consists in placing the patient upon an isolated stool, and connecting him with the prime conductor, of which he thus becomes a part. The ends of the wire communicate respectively, with a pair of directors, each of which holds a piece of sponge, dipped in vinegar or a solution of common salt. When the armature is rotated, and a portion of the body is interposed between the directors, a succession of shocks is received.

ELECTROPUNCTURE, Electropunctur'ation, Electrostix'is, Gal'vanopuncture. The operation of inserting two or more wires, and then connecting them to the poles of the galvanic apparatus.

ELEPHANTIASIS, Elephantia, Elephantiasis, Elephas, Lazarus morbus vel malum Phanicæus morbus, Phymatosis Elephantiasis, from ελεphas, 'an elephant.' Various affections have been described under this name, by adding an epithet. It is ordinarily and generically applied to a condition, in which the skin is thick, livid, rugous, tuberculate, and insensible to feeling.

ELEPHANTIASIS ARABICA, Maladie glandulaire, Ladzeria, Tyrsiasis, Elephas, Elephantiasis, E. Indica, Elephantia Arabum, Lepra Arabum, (of some.) In this the tubercles are chiefly on the face and joints. There is loss of hair, except on the scalp; voice, hoarse and nasal; and the disease is said to be contagious and hereditary. It most frequently attacks the feet; and gives the lower extremity a fancied resemblance to the leg of the elephant, whence its name. The seat of the disease seems to be in the lymphatic vessels and glands, and in the subcutaneous cellular tissue: the inflammatory condition of which is accompanied with general morbid symptoms. Medicine has little or no effect on this loathsome complaint. See Lepra.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF CAYENNE, Mal rouge de Cayenne, seems to be a variety of Lepra, characterized by red and yellow spots, occupying the forehead, ears, hands, loins, &c., afterwards extending and becoming scaly, with deformity of the parts where they are seated, particularly of the face; and ultimately producing cracks, ulcers, caries, and sometimes death.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF THE GREEKS, E. Græcorum, is probably the same disease as Lepra.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF INDIA is characterized by red, livid, or yellowish spots, slightly prominent, to which succeed indolent tumours, formed in the cellular texture. At a more advanced period the phalanges swell, and become ulcerated; the bones of the nose carious, the lips thickened, and emaciation gradually carries off the patient. It likewise belongs to lepra.

ELEPHANTIASIS ITALICA, Pellagra.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF JAVA is likewise a variety of lepra, characterized by large, white tumours on the toes and fingers, resembling scrofulous tumefactions. These tumours ulcerate, and the ulcerations spread from the extremities towards the trunk, destroying even the bones. Amputation can alone arrest its progress. The disease is often accompanied by alopecia, and by an eruption of red spots.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF THE ANTILLES, Barba'does Leg, Glandular disease of Barbadoes, (F.) Jambes de Barbado, is the Elephantiasis of many writers, Bucno'mia. It is characterized by the leg being enormously tumid and misshapen: skin thickened, livid and rugose; often scaly: scrotum, arms or other parts sometimes participating in the affection. The Bucno'mia Tro-pica, Cochin leg, is an affection of this kind.

ELEPHANTINUM EMPLASTRUM, Em-plastrum. An ancient plaster, composed of 30 parts of ceruus; 45 of wax, oil Res, water Bj.—Castelli. Orubasius and Celsus both mention a plaster of this name, but by no means similar in composition.

ELEPHANTOMMA, Buphthalmia.

ELEVATOR, from elevare, (s, and levare), 'to lift up.' (F.) Élévateur. A muscle, whose function it is to raise the part into which it is inserted. See Levator.

ELEVATOR, Elevatorium, Vectis elevatorium. A name given to different surgical instruments, employed for raising portions of bone, which have been depressed, or for raising and detaching the portion of bone separated by the crown of the trepan.

ELEVATOR ANTI, Levator anti—s. Labii inferioris, Levator labii inferioris—e. Labii superioris proprius, Levator labii superioris proprius—e. Labiorum communis, Levator anguli oris—e. Oculi, Rectus superior oculi—e. Patientiæ, Levator scapulæ—e. Scapulæ, Levator scapulæ—e. Testiculi, Cremaster—e. Urethræ, see Transversus perinei.

ELEVATOR, COMMON. This is a mere lever; the end of which is somewhat bent and made rough, in order that it may less readily slip away from the portion of bone which is to be raised. The instrument is used, by forming a fulcrum for it, either on the hand which holds it, or upon the fingers of the other hand; or by making a fixed point for it on the edge of the opening made with the trephine.

ELEVATOR OF LOUIS differed from the last only in the circumstance of the screw-peg being united to the bridge by a kind of pivot instead of hinge, so that greater extent of motion was permitted.

ELEVATOR OF PETIT consists of a lever mounted on a handle, and straight throughout its whole length, except at its very end, which is slightly curved, in order that it may be more conveniently put under the portion of bone, intended to be elevated. The lever is pierced at various distances from its but-end with several holes, intended for the reception of a movable screw-peg, fixed on the top of a kind of bridge. This part of the instrument consists of an arch, the ends of which are long, and covered with small pads, and on its centre is the screw-peg already mentioned: By means of these holes the arm of the lever can be lengthened at pleasure.

ELEVATOR, TRIP'LOD, Vectis triploides. This was so called from its consisting of three branches, uniting above in one common trunk. The latter part was traversed by a long screw, having below a kind of hook, and above a handle for turning it. By turning the screw, the hook was drawn up, and the bone thus elevated.

The simple lever is the only one now used, owing to the want of facility and advantages in the use of the others.

EMMENAGOGUES, Emmenago'ga, Emmeniago'ga, Ame'nia, from εμμηνα, 'the menses,' and αγω, 'I drive,' or 'expel.' Menagogues. A name given to medicines believed to have the power of favouring the discharge of the menses. It is doubtful whether there be any substance which possesses this power directly. According to different conditions of the system, the most opposite remedies may act as emmenagogues. Black hellebore, saffron, mad-dor, polygala senega, and ergot, are reputed to be specific emmenagogues. The following list comprises the chief of them:—Cunila Pulegioides; Hellebore Niger; Mentha Pulegium; Rosmarinus; Rubia; Sabina; Secale Cornutum; Senega, and Tanacetum.

EMOLLIENTIA, Emollients.

EMOLLIENTS, Emollientia, Maltha'tica, Relaxan'tia, Epiceras'tica, Malac'tica, Lubri-cantia, Malacopa'a, Mollim'tia, from emollire, (e, and mollire, 'to soften.') Substances which relax and soften parts that are inflamed, or too tense. They are used both internally and externally: as the former, however, consist of mucilaginous substances, they are generally reckoned as demulcents: the latter, or proper emollients, consist of oils, cataplasms, fomentations, &c. Oleaginous bodies, rubbed on a part, act by diminishing its cohesion. Fomentations, in cases of internal inflammation, act probably through contiguous sympathy. The following are the chief emollients:—Adeps; Amygdalæ Oleum; Avæna Farina; Cera; Cetaceum; Linum; Olivæ Oleum; Sesamum; Tritici Farina, and Ulmus.

ÉMONCTOIRE, Emunctory.

EMOPTOE, Hæmoptysis.

EMOTIO, Delirium, Luxation, Passion.

EMOTIONAL, from emotio, (e, 'from,' and moveo, motus, 'to move.') Relating to emotion or passion independently of the will:—hence an 'emotional or instinctive impulse.'

EMPASMA, Catapasma.

EMPÂTEMENT, from empâter, 'to render pasty or doughy.' A non-inflammatory engorgement, which retains, more or less, the impression of the finger.

EMPHRACTIC, Emphracticus.

EMPHRACTICA, Physconia.

EMPHRACTICUS, Emphrac'tic, from εμπαρτω, 'I close,' 'I obstruct.' Emphas'ticus, Emplatton'enos. Any substance which, when applied to the skin, closes the pores.

EMPHRAG'MA, same etymon. Obturamentum, Impedimentum. Anything that obstructs. Hippocrates uses this term to designate the obstacle to delivery on the part of the fœtus, when the presentation is preternatural.

ΕΜΦΡΑΓ'ΜΑ ΛΑΧΡΥΜΑΛΕ, Fistula lachrymalis—e. Sali-vare, Ranula.

This term is commonly applied to any white, crepitant, shining, elastic, indolent tumour, caused by the introduction of air into the cellular texture. Injuries of the larynx, trachea, or lungs; fractures of the ribs, or wounds penetrating the chest are the most frequent causes of this affection, which is owing to the air escaping from the air-passages and insinuating itself into the cellular texture surrounding the wound. There are some cases of emphysema, which are owing to internal causes; and hence a division has been made into the accidental and symptomatic, and the spontaneous and idiopathic.

EMPHYSEMA ABDOMINIS, Tympanites.

EMPHYSEMA OF THE LUNGS, E. Pulmo'num, Asthma ætærum ab Emphyse' matè Pulmo'num, Pneumato'sis Pulmo'num, Pneumoc'taris, (F.) Pneumoc'taris, Emphyse'ma du Poumon. A considerable pressure or contusion of the chest, or any violent concussion of the lung, may produce a laceration in that viscus, without injury being done to the parietes of the thorax, and may give place to the infiltration of air into the cellular texture, interlobular emphysema. Laënnec has described another species of emphysema of the lungs, Vesicular emphysema, consisting in excessive dilatation of the air-cells, some of which become as large as hemp-seed, ultimately break, and give rise to irregular vesicles at the surface of the lung, some of which are as large as a hazel nut. Physical Signs. The thorax externally, generally or locally, appears unnaturally convex and prominent. The intercostal spaces are widened, but depressed. The inspiratory efforts are increased. The sound on percussion is morbidly clear, but not tympanitic. On auscultation, the inspiratory murmur is feeble or suppressed. The expiration, which is more frequently audible, is prolonged, laborious and wheezing. There are no certain physical signs which can distinguish interlobular emphysema from the vesicular.

EMPHYSEME, Emphysema—e. du Pôisson, Emphysema of the lungs.

EMPHYTUM THERMUM, Biolychnium.

EMPIRIC, Empiricus, from εμπειρα, (επ, and πειρα, 'a trial,' 'experience.' One who follows only experience. A sect of physicians, who rejected all theory and took for their guide experience alone. It was opposed to the dogmatic sect. The Empiric sect prevailed till near the time of Galen. Amongst its most eminent members, after Philinus and Serapion, were Apollonius, Glaucias, Bacchius of Tanagra, and Zeuxis,—both disciples of Herophilus,—Heraclides of Tarentum, Cleophantus, master of Asclepiades, Menodotus of Nicomedia, and Theudas of Laodicea. They occupied themselves, chiefly, with discovering the properties of drugs, and did important service, in this manner, to medicine.

At the present day, the word Empiric is only taken in a bad sense, being employed in nearly the same signification as charlatan or quack.

EMPIRICE, Empiricism.

EMPIRICISM; same etymon. Empirica Ars, Empiricæ, (F.) Empirismo. Medicine founded on experience. It generally, at the present day, signifies quackery.

EMPIRISME, Empiricism.

EMPLASTICUS. Same etymon as the next. Also a remedy, which adheres as a plaster to the surface, and in this manner may obstruct the pores: an emphractic.

EMPLASTRO-ENDERMIC, Endermic.

EMPLASTRUM, from the Greek, εμπλαστρω, (επ, and πλασσω, 'to form,') 'I spread upon.' (F.) Emplâtre. A solid and tenacious compound, adhesive at the ordinary heat of the human body. Some of the plasters owe their consistence to wax and resin; and others to the chemical union which takes place between the semivitreous oxide of lead and oil. Most of them become too consistent by age. When such is the case, they may be re-melted by a gentle heat, and oil be added to them.

A collection of blood or pus, and, conventionally, of other fluid, in some cavity of the body, and particularly in that of the pleura. Empyema is one of the terminations of inflammation of the pleura, and is called, also, Pyotho'rax verus, Pleurorrha'a purulen'ta, Diapyo'ma, Ecpyē'ma, Ecpyē'sis, Empyē'sis pectoris, Pyo'sis pectoris, Hydrotho'rax purulen'tus, Dyspna'a pyothorac'ica, Pneumo'nia suppurato'ria, Abscessus pectoris, A. Thora'cis, Pleuroposte'ma, Pleuropyo'sis, (F.) Pyopleuritis. The operation for empyema properly means the making of an opening into the thorax for the purpose of giving issue to the matter collected in the cavity of the pleura, although it has been used for the operation required for the evacuation of any fluid from the chest, or synonymously with Paracentesis thoracis.

EMPYE'SIS; same etymon. Suppuration. An eruption of phlegmonous pimples, gradually filling with a purulent fluid, and terminating in thick scabs, frequently leaving pits or scabs. Pustulosa Ezan'them. A genus in the order Ezanthematica, class Hamatica of Good. See Empyema.

EMPYOMPHALUS, from εμ, 'in,' πυρ, 'pus,' and ομφαλος, 'the navel.' This word has been used to designate a suppurating tumour at the umbilicus; or, at times, umbilical hernia, the sac of which is filled with blood.

EMPYOS, Purulent.

EMPYREUMA, from εμ πυρ εμ, (εμ, and πυρ, 'fire,') 'I kindle.' The burnt smell and acrid taste, which volatile products—gaseous and liquid—contract, when animal or vegetable substances are decomposed with a strong heat. The cause of this smell is seated in an oil, called empyreumat'ic, which does not exist in the substance subjected to the operation, but is the result of its decomposition. If the empyreuma occurs when the organic substance is placed in a still with a liquid, it is owing to the solid matter touching the bottom of the vessel to which the fire is applied.

EMPYREUMATIC, *Empyreumat'icus: same etymon. Belonging to empyreuma,—as an empyreumatic odour.

The enamel is of a milky-white colour, and sufficiently hard to strike fire with steel. Its surface is very smooth and polished, and it forms a thicker layer towards the part where the teeth come in contact, and becomes thinner towards the cervix. The fibres of the enamel are perpendicular to the surface of the teeth, on the ivory of which they seem, as it were, planted. This gives them a velvety appearance, when examined by the microscope. The enamel has no blood vessels, and is not renewed when removed. It is formed of phosphâ of lime, and a very small portion of animal matter.

Brain. This may be a congenital or accidental affection. In the former case, it is dependent upon tardy ossification of the fontanelles or some faulty conformation. In the latter, it is owing to some considerable loss of substance in the parietes of the cranium, produced by fractures, wounds with a cutting instrument, caries, the application of the trephine, &c. In slight congenital encephalocoele, gentle pressure may be exerted upon the protruded portion. When the disease is of considerable extent, it is fatal. In accidental encephalocoele, similar means must be used for confining the tumour, and preserving it from the action of external bodies.

It is either encysted, in irregular masses without cysts, or infiltrated into the texture of the diseased organ. This name was given to it in consequence of its resemblance, when fully developed, to the medullary substance of the brain. It is also called *Fungus medullaris, F. Cancro'sus medullaris, Sarcos'ma medullarè, Spongoid inflammation, Fungus cerebra'lis, Cancer-cerebriformè, Cancer mollis, C. Medullaris, Carcino'ma medullarè, C. Thus, ague is endemic in marshy countries; goitre at the base of lofty mountains, &c. Some authors use the term in the same sense as epidemic. We have no accurate knowledge of the emanations or other circumstances, which give occasion to endemic affections. We seem to know that some emanation from marshy lands does produce intermittent; but we are ignorant of the nature of such emanation.

ENDOCARDI'TIS, Cardi'tis inter'na, In-flammatio super'f'ici inter'næ cordis, Inter'nal Carditis, Inflammation of the internal mem-brane of the heart, from Endocard'ium, the lining membrane of the heart, and itis, inflam-mation. Inflammation of the lining membrane of the heart. In this disease, the heart's action is visibly increased, and very manifest to the touch; the hand is strongly repelled, and, at moments, is sensible of a trembling vibratory motion. Percussion gives a dull sound over a surface of several inches, owing, according to Bouillaud, to the inflammatory turgescence of the heart, and the engorged state of its cavities. On auscultation, a bruit de soufflet is generally heard, masking one or both sounds of the heart; and the ear is sensible of a metallic ringing with each systole of the ventricle. The pulsa-tions are rapid as well as strong, and, with few exceptions, irregular, unequal and intermittent. The pulse, by the way, does not always indicate the force or number of the heart's contrac-tions.

ENDOCAR'DIUM, from en, 'within,' and καρδία, 'the heart.' The membrane that lines the interior of the heart.

ENDO-SKELETON, see Skeleton.

ENDOSMOSE, Imbibit'ion, from en, 'within,' and σμεος, 'impulse.' A term used by Dutrochet, to express the action by which fluids pass through organic membranes. This is done by the porosity of the tissue, in the same manner as it is effected through inorganic sub-stances, as through fused glass. The rapidity with which it is accomplished varies according to the nature of the septum or tissue of the penetrating body, and to the penetrability of the tissue.

ENDOSMOTIC, Endosmot'icus; same etym-on. Belonging to endosmos:—as an 'endos-motic current.'

ENDOSTEITIS, from en, 'within,' osteos, 'a bone,' and itis, denoting inflammation. In-flammation of the internal periosteum.

This term is often applied to a layer of greater or less thickness which covers the surface of certain organs, and particularly of the tongue and interior of the mouth. The enduit is designated variously, ac-cording to its appearance,—enduit bilieux, jaune, blanc, &c.—a bilious, yellow, white coat or fur, &c. It is at times owing to the evaporation of the watery portions of the secretions; at others to a morbid condition of the secretions;—generally, to both causes combined.

mato'ria, Febria intestino'rum, P. ili'aca inflammato'ria, Enterop'ya, (F.) Entéritis, Inflammation des Intestins. The essential symptoms of this disease are:—violent abdominal pain increased on pressure; with vomiting and inflammatory fever. Enteritis may affect both the peritoneal and the mucous coat of the intestines; and in violent cases all the coats may be implicated. The structure of the mucous and peritoneal coats is different; so are their functions in health and disease. The inflammation of the serous coat, Sero-enteritis, resembles that of the cellular membrane; the inflammation of the mucous coat that of the skin. The former is usually, therefore, of a more active character. Inflammation of the mucous coat, Eso-enteritis, Endo-enteritis, Mucro-enteritis, Mucosus Enteritis, Phlegmymenitis enterica, is generally attended with diarrhœa, and its pathology is identical with that of Dysentery. Inflammation of the peritoneal coat is, on the other hand, generally attended with constipation.

Enteritis of the peritoneal coat, for such usually is the meaning of the word in the abstract, requires the most active treatment. Copious bleeding, followed up by a large dose of opium—and if the symptoms be not decidedly ameliorated, repeating the bleeding and opium—warm fomentations, and blisters are the chief agents to be relied upon. Purgatives ought not to be exhibited until the inflammation and spasm are abated by the use of the bleeding and opium. When the physician is called early, this plan will usually succeed. Sometimes, Enteritis passes into a chronic state, requiring much careful management. Broussais considered inflammation of the mucous coat of the stomach and intestines as the proximate cause of the phenomena of fever.

lids, so that the eyelashes are directed towards the globe of the eye; irritate and inflame it; and give rise to the affection called Trichi'asis.

The contact of the hair with the surface of the eye occasions considerable irritation of the conjunctiva, which is soon followed by chemosis, ulceration of the eye, and other symptoms, such as fever, watchfulness, &c.

If the disease be entropion, as above defined, that is, dependent upon the inversion of the eyelids, it must be remedied,—either by dispersing the œdema or swelling of the eyelids, or by cutting out a portion of the skin. When the disease is dependent upon a vicious direction of the cilia, they must be plucked out and the bulbs be cauterized.

This affection is most common in advanced life. It may depend on too great irritability of the bladder, or on distention, or injury of the fibres about its neck, paralysis of the organ, the presence of an irregularly shaped calculus impacted in the urethra near its commencement; rupture of the bladder and urethra; renal disease; or on pressure exerted on the bladder by the distended womb or by a tumour. It often occurs after difficult labour, but generally yields, in the course of a week or ten days; the catheter being introduced twice a day in the mean time.

The treatment must of course vary according to the cause; and when the affection, on which it is dependent, cannot be removed, the discharge of urine may be prevented by exerting a degree of compression on the urethra, by means of appropriate instruments; or a urinal may be employed to receive the urine as it passes off.

See Chloasma. They do not extend farther than the skin. Many cosmetics have been recommended for their removal. Simple spirituous lotions or weak mineral acids, applied a few times in the day, are as effectual as any other means.

EPHIPPIMUM, Pituitaria fossa, Sella Turcica.

EPH'ODOS, from ἐπι, 'upon,' and ὄδος, 'a way,' 'a road or avenue to a place.' Hippocrates uses this word in three senses: 1. A disease which attacks at the same time a number of individuals, and which is depending upon some particular constitutio aeris, or condition of the atmosphere, with which we are utterly ignorant. It differs from endemia, the latter being owing to locality; but it is obvious, that should a particular epidemic constitution of the air—epidemiois, (F.) epidemioides,—exist along with a favouring endemic condition, these combined influences may act in the causation of several of those serious and fatal complaints, which at times visit a district, and are never afterwards met with, or at least not until after the lapse of a considerable period.

A transparent, dry, thin membrane, devoid of nerves and vessels, which covers all the surface of the body, except the parts that correspond to the nails. It appears to consist of minute scales, placed one above the other. Chaussier considers it to be formed and reproduced by an excretory action of the true skin; to act like a dry varnish, which prevents the immediate contact of bodies with the nervous papillæ, and consequently to deaden tactile impressions, which, without its intervention, might be painful. The Epider'mic, Epider'mous, or Epider'moid, (as Bichat called it) System, in general anatomy, comprises three parts. 1. External Epidermis. 2. Epidermis spread over the mucous membranes. 3. It arises from the external iliac, on a level with the crural arch; sometimes by a trunk proper to it, at others by a trunk common to it and the Obturator artery. It ascends upwards and inwards, behind the spermatic cord, follows the outer edge of the rectus abdominis muscle, and anastomoses, towards the umbilicus, with the internal mammary. The epigastric artery anastomoses, also, with the obturator, spermatic, lumbar, and intercostal vessels.

EPIGASTRIC REGION, Regio epigas'trica, R. cardi'aca, R. stomach'ica, R. Stomacha'tis, is the superior region of the abdomen, comprised between the false ribs on each side, and extending from the lower surface of the diaphragm to two fingers' breadth above the umbilicus. A collection of small, glandular granula, situate in the adipose, cellular texture at the base of the anterior surface of the epiglottis, in a triangular space, bounded anteriorly by the thyro-hyoid membrane and thyroid cartilage. It pours out an unctuous and mucous fluid, which lubricates the epiglottis, keeps it supple and movable, and prevents the larynx from being irritated by the constant passage of the air, in the act of respiration.

EPIGLOT'TIS, from επι, 'upon,' and γλωττις, 'the glottis.' Epiglot'tic cartilage, Lig'ula, Oper'culum laryngis, Lingua Ex'igua, Lin'gula fœ'talis, Sublin'guum, Superlig'ula. Its form is oval; texture elastic; thickness greater below than above, and greater in the middle than at the sides. By its smaller extremity, which is the lower, it is attached to the thyroid cartilage; its two surfaces are covered by the mucous membrane of the pharynx and larynx. The special use of the epiglottis would seem to be to cover the glottis accurately at the moment of deglutition, and, thus, to assist in opposing the passage of alimentary substances into the air tubes.

The word is derived from επιλαμβάνω, 'I seize upon.' It is a disease of the brain, which may either be idiopathic or symptomatic, spontaneous or accidental, and which occurs in paroxysms, with uncertain intervals between. These paroxysms are characterized by loss of sensation and convulsive motions of the muscles. Frequently, the fit attacks suddenly; at other times, it is preceded by indisposition, vertigo, and stupor. At times, before the loss of consciousness occurs, a sensation of a cold vapour is felt, hence called aura epilep'tica. This appears to rise in some part of the body, proceeds towards the head; and as soon as it has reached the brain the patient falls down. The ordinary duration of a fit is from 5 to 20 minutes. Sometimes it goes off in a few seconds; at others, it is protracted for hours. In all cases, there is a loss of sensation, sudden falling down, distortion of the eyes and face; countenance of a red, purple or violet colour; grinding of the teeth; foaming at the mouth; convulsions of the limbs; difficult respiration, generally stertorous; with, sometimes, involuntary discharge of feces and urine. After the fit, the patient retains not the least recollection of what has passed, but remains, for some time, affected with head-ache, stupor, and lassitude.

The disease is in the brain, and is generally organic; but it may be functional and symptomatic of irritation in other parts, as in the stomach, bowels, &c. The prognosis, as to ultimate recovery, is unfavourable. It does not, however, frequently destroy life, but is apt to lead to mental imbecility. Dissection has not thrown light on its pathology.

To the attacks of epilepsy which are unaccompanied by convulsions, as is sometimes the case, the French give the name Petit-mal, and Epilepsia Vertigo. When furious mania succeeds to a paroxysm, it is termed Mania epileptica and Epileptic Delirium.

In the treatment, the cause must be sought after, and if possible removed. In the paroxysm, but little can be done; but as the tongue is liable to be injured by the teeth, the jaws may be kept open by putting a cork or piece of wood between them. If the fit have been brought on by indigestible food, the stomach must be cleared. It is between the paroxysms that the great effort must be made. Generally, there is considerable irritability and debility of the nervous system, and hence tonics have been found the best remedies. Of these, perhaps the most powerful, in epilepsy, is the argenti nitras, given regularly and continued for months, if necessary. Preparations of iron, copper, and zinc, have also been used, and the general class of the vegetable tonics and antispasmodics. Counter irritants, as blisters, moxa, &c., may be employed, if necessary, along with this course.

Unfortunately, in many cases, these means are found insufficient, and all that can be done is to palliate, removing carefully all exciting causes; such as the use of spirituous liquors, strong emotions, violent exercise, &c.; and regulating the diet.

Anatomists have described several epiploons. The uses of the omentum are but little known. The chief one seems to be, to retain the viscera in situ, and to give passage to vessels.

EPIPLOON, COLIC, Colic Omentum, O. colicum, Third Epiploon or Omentum, is a duplicature of the peritoneum, situate along the ascending portion of the colon, as far as its junction with the transverse portion. It is behind the great epiploon, and fills up the angle formed by the junction of the ascending with the transverse colon. Its two laminae are separated by colic arteries and veins.

This is one of the most common varieties of hemorrhage; the organization of the Schneiderian membrane being favourable to it, as the blood vessels are but slightly supported. It does not generally flow from both nostrils, and is very apt to recur. Puberty is the period at which it is most common. Its exciting causes are:—any thing that will induce local congestions, as running, coughing, blowing the nose, &c., provided there be a predisposition to it. A common case of epistaxis requires but little treatment, especially if in a young person. Light diet and a dose or two of the sulphate of magnesia will be sufficient. In more severe attacks, cold and astringent washes of alum, sulphate of zinc, weak sulphuric acid, or creosote may be used, and the nostrils be plugged anteriorly; but if the bleeding goes on posteriorly, the posterior nares must be plugged likewise,—the patient being kept with the head raised. The flow of blood has been arrested, by directing the patient to stand up with his head elevated, compressing the nostril whence the blood flows with the finger, raising the corresponding arm perpendicularly, and holding it in this position for about two minutes. A less vigorous circulation through the carotids appears to result from the increased force required to carry on the circulation through the upper extremities when raised.—Négrier. To prevent the recurrence, strict diet must be inculcated.

EPISTERNAL, Episterna'tis, from ἐπι, 'upon,' and στήθος, 'the sternum.' An epithet applied to two bones, which form part of the sternum, and are situate upon its superior and lateral part. Two forms are met with.—E. mitis, contracted from horses affected with grease, and E. glandulosa, a dangerous and commonly fatal disease communicated to man, either in the acute or chronic form, from the glandered horse. The veterinary surgeons make two varieties of the disease in the horse—Glanders, Mal'tia, Mal'ias'mus, Mal'tiè, Mal'is, Mallous; and Farcy glanders, Farcino'ma, (F.) Morvus farcinous:—the former affecting the pituitary membrane and occasioning a profuse discharge from the nostrils, with pustular eruptions or small tumours, which soon suppurate and ulcerate, being attended by symptoms of malignant fever and by gangrene of various parts:—the latter being the same disease, but appearing in the shape of small tumours about the legs, lips, face, neck, &c. of the horse; sometimes very painful, suppurating and degenerating into foul ulcers. They are often seen together.

It is formed of a collection of arteries and veins, intermixed with nervous filaments; which form, by their numerous anastomoses, a spongy substance, whose areolæ communicate with each other. This tissue exists in the corpora cavernosa of the penis and clitoris, at the lower and inner surface of the vagina, in the spongy part of the urethra, the lips, nipples, iris, &c. Sometimes it is developed accidentally, and constitutes a kind of organic transformation.

ing; tremors; small, quick, sometimes intermitting, pulse; occasional vomiting; pale, contracted countenance, and sense of coldness; but the tongue is seldom furred, nor are the vital and natural functions much disturbed. In this state any sudden exertion may prove fatal.

Melanophy'ma, Spurred or Horned Rye, the Spur, Hornseed, (F.) Seigle ergotie, Blé ornu*. Ergot is generally considered to be the result of a disease in rye, occurring most frequently when a hot summer succeeds a rainy spring. Decandolle, however, regards it as a parasitic fungus, and calls it Sclerotium clavus; whilst Leveillé esteems it to be a fungus giving a coating to the diseased grain; the medical virtues residing in the coating. This parasitic fungus he calls Sphaeria rog'otum. More recently, it has been maintained, that it is a diseased state of the grain occasioned by the growth of a fungus not previously detected, to which the name Ergotia abortans seu abortifaciens, has been given. It is found projecting from among the leaves of the spike or ear; and is a long, crooked excrescence, resembling the spur of a cock; pointed at its extremities; of a dark-brown colour externally, and white within.

This substance has been long used in Germany to act on the uterus, as its names Mutterkorn and Gebärpulver (womb-grain, pulvis parturiens) testify. About 40 years ago, it was recommended in this country, by Dr. John Stearns, of Saratoga County, New York, for accelerating parturition; and since that period, numerous testimonials have been offered in its favour. Half a drachm of the powder is gently boiled in half a pint of water, and one-third part given every 20 minutes, until proper pains begin. Some recommend the clear watery infusion; others advise the powder; others the oil, and others the wine. It is obvious, that in many cases the uterine efforts would return in the period which would necessarily elapse in the administration of ergot, so that several of the cases, at least, of reputed efficacy, may not have been dependent upon the assigned agent. Ergot also possesses—it is affirmed—narcotic virtues, which have rendered it useful in hemorrhagic and other affections of excitement.

Bread, made of spurred rye, has been attended with the effects described under ERGOTISM.

Boerhaave admitted several orders of capillary vessels; the diameters of which went on decreasing. The largest received red blood: those which came next received only white: others only lymph; whilst the last of all were destined for yet more subtle fluids—for a kind of vapour. When the red globules entered vessels destined for the white, or the white those intended for the thinner fluids, there was, according to the theory of Boerhaave, an error loci, and the proximate cause of inflammation and other mischiefs. See Aber-ratio.

Erysi'pèle, Feu St. Antoine, Feu sacré, Mal Saint Antoine. A disease, so called because it generally extends gradually to the neighbouring parts. Superficial inflammation of the skin, with general fever, tension and swelling of the part; pain and heat more or less acrid; redness diffused, but more or less circumscribed, and disappearing when pressed upon by the finger, but returning as soon as the pressure is removed. Frequently, small vesicles appear upon the inflamed part, which dry up and fall off, under the form of branny scales. Erysipelas is, generally, an acute affection: its medium duration being from 10 to 14 days. It yields, commonly, to general refrigerant remedies. Topical applications are rarely serviceable. At times, when the disease approaches the phlegmonous character, copious bleeding and other evacuations may be required, as in many cases of erysipelas of the face; but this is not commonly necessary. In most cases, indeed, the general action seems deficient, and it becomes necessary to give tonics.

When erysipelas is of a highly inflammatory character, and invades the parts beneath, it is termed Erysipelas phlegmonodes, (F.) Erysipels phlegmonous: when accompanied with phlyctenæ, and the inflammation terminates in gangrene, Erysipelas gangranosum, (F.) Erysipels gangrinous; and when associated with infiltration of serum, Erysipelas adematosum, (F.) Erysipels adematous.

For this purpose the latter throw out fleshy granulations, and a more or less abundant suppuration occurs, which tends to separate the exfoliated part,—now become an extraneous body. The ancients distinguished exfoliation into sensible and insensible, according as the dead portions of bone were detached in fragments of greater or less size, or in very thin pieces, and in an almost insensible manner. When the dead part embraces all or almost all the substance of a bone, it takes the name Sequestrum.

The external, terminating on the mucous and external dermoid system, where they pour the matter of perspiration. 2. The internal, comprising those of the cellular and medullary tissues, and of synovial surfaces; and, 3. The nutritive exhalants, which vary in each organ where they are found; and preside over the phenomena of composition and increase of every part of the body. Hernia occurring at the navel. This affection happens more frequently in infants, and takes place by the umbilical ring. In adults, it occurs more commonly in females than in males; and, when it does so, the sac passes in the vicinity of the umbilicus. The organs, found in this kind of hernia, are particularly,—the epiploon, the jejunum, the arch of the colon, and sometimes the stomach. The tumour is, in general, round, and presents all the characters of hernia. It is, commonly, readily reducible, and not subject to strangulation. It must be reduced, and retained by an elastic bandage, made in the form of a girdle, and furnished with a pad at its middle part. When strangulated, the stricture may be divided upwards and towards the left side.

EXONCO'MA, Exonco'sis, from εἶ, and ὄγκος, 'a tumour.' A large, prominent tumour. Used, by Galen, for protuberance of the vertebræ after luxation.

(F.) Procidencia de l'œil. A protrusion of the eye from its orbit, occasioned by an abscess or tumour in the cellular texture of the orbit; by exostosis of the parietes of the orbit, &c. In exophthalmia, the eye is pressed forwards; the eyelids are raised and separated, so that they can no longer cover the eye and defend it from the action of extraneous bodies: it becomes inflamed, and the sight is disturbed or destroyed. The treatment of course depends upon the cause.

EXOPHTHAL'MIA FUNGO'SA, Sarcosis bulbi—e. Sarcomatica, Sarcosis bulbi.

EXOPHTHALMUS, same etymon. One whose eyes are very prominent. The opposite to Cœlophthalmus.

Laminis*;—that which is formed of laminae in superposition or of distinct filaments. The Spongy Exostosis is that whose structure is analogous to the spongy tissue of bones. Exostoses are sometimes distinguished into the true, which seem to be a projection of the osseous substance, and which have the same organization and hardness as that substance; and the false, or osteo-sarcoma. Exostosis may depend on syphilis, scrofula, rickets, gout, &c. In such cases, it is important to get rid of the primary disease.

Those exostoses, which occur within the bones, have, by some, been called Enostoses.

EXPECTATION, Expectatio; same etymon. The word expectation has been applied, in medicine, to that method, which consists in observing the progress of diseases, and removing deranging influences, without prescribing active medicines, unless such shall be imperiously required. It consists, in fact, in leaving the disease almost wholly to the efforts of nature, and has been termed the art of curing diseases by expectation or waiting—Ars sanandi cum expectatione.

EXPECTORANT, Expectorans, Anacatharticus, Ptyssagogus, from ex, 'out of,' and pectus, 'the breast.' A medicine capable of facilitating or provoking expectoration. There is probably no such thing as a direct expectorant. They all act through the system, or by impressions made on parts at a distance, which, through the medium of general, continuous, or contiguous sympathy, excite the secretory vessels of the air-passages into action. The following are the chief reputed expectorants:—Ammoniacum; Asafetida; Galbanum; Ipecacuanha; Myroxyton; Myrrha; Inhalations, (of Iodine, Stramonium, Tar, Burning Wool, Tobacco, &c.); Scilla; Senega, and Tolutanum.

EXPERIENCE, Experientia, Peira, Empe'ra, from  $\epsilon\tilde{\iota}$ , and  $\pi\epsilon\iota\tau\alpha$ , 'a trial.' A knowledge of things acquired by observation. In medicine, this knowledge can be obtained both by the practitioner's own experience, and by that obtained from tradition and from books. To profit by experience requires a mind capable of appreciating the proper relations between cause and effect; and hence it happens, that false experience, Experientia fallax, is extremely common; and that a man had better, in many instances, trust to that which he has learned from others, than to his own fallacious observation.

The union of accurate observation by the physician with that handed down by medical writers constitutes perfect experience, so far as it is attainable in any individual case.

EXPERIENCE, Experiment.

EXPERIMENT, Experimentum; same etymon. (F.) Expérience. A trial, made on the bodies of men or animals, for the purpose of detecting the effect of a remedy, or of becoming better acquainted with their structure, functions or peculiarities. In a more general sense, it means any trial instituted with the intent of becoming better acquainted with any thing. By experiments on living animals, we have obtained much valuable information in the various departments of medicine; but particularly in physiology and toxicology.

EXPIRATORY, Expiratio'nis inser'vions. The expiratory muscles are all those which contribute to diminish the cavity of the chest, for the purpose of expelling the air contained in the lungs, or of producing expiration. These muscles are, chiefly, the intercostals, triangularis sterni, quadratus lumborum, serratus pectus inferior, the oblique and recti muscles of the abdomen, the sacro-lumbalis, &c.

EXPRESS'ION, Expres'sio, Expres'mos, E'cthlip'sis, from ex, 'out of,' and premere, 'to press.' The act of compressing a substance, for the purpose of separating from it the fluids which it contains. Also, the manner in which impressions made upon us are depicted; especially in the traits of the countenance.

EXPRESSION OF SWEAT, (F.) Susus d'expression, is a term given to the passive perspiration observable in very debilitated individuals.

EXTRACTION, Extractio, Exa'rsis, Exog'o'gē, Ezolet, Exalcoy'mus, Enchylo'sis, from extrahere, (ex, and trahere,) 'to draw out.' The act of removing an extraneous substance from any part of the body. Thus, a splinter is said to be extracted. It is, also, applied to the removal of certain parts. The cataract is said to be extracted: a tooth is extracted, when carious, &c.

EXTRACTIVE, (F.) Extractif. Same etymon. A peculiar, immediate principle, which has been admitted in extracts. Thus, bitter extractives is the immediate principle of bitter vegetables, &c.

EXTRACTUM, Extract, Eochylo'ma, (F.) Extrait. An extract is prepared by evaporating vegetable solutions, till a tenacious mass is obtained. When prepared from an infusion or decoction, it is called a watery,—from a tincture, a spirituous extract. Both kinds contain all the principles of the vegetable, that are soluble in the menstrua with which they are prepared; but the volatile parts are dissipated, and some of the fixed parts are decomposed; the proper extractive is oxygenized, and the virtues of the vegetable substance consequently altered or destroyed. Extracts are hard or soft; the consistence of the soft being such as to retain the pilular form without the addition of a powder. A patent was taken out some years ago by a Mr. Barry, of London, for preparing them in vacuo; and, as the temperature is much lower than in the ordinary method, the virtues of the plant are less altered, and the extracts are generally green. Extracts are also prepared by displacement or percolation. They have, likewise, received different names according to their predominant principle. The gummy or mucous, or mucilaginous, are those which are mainly composed of gum or mucilage. Gum tragacanth may be considered a pure gummy extract. Galatinous extracts are those composed especially of gelatin; resinous extracts, those of a resinous character; extracto-resinous, those composed of extractive or colouring matter and resin; gum-resinous, those containing gum and resin; and saponaceous or saponaceous saline, those containing a notable quantity of saline substances and a resinous matter, so combined with mucus and other soluble substances, that they cannot be separated.

EXTRACTUM ACONIT'I ALCOHOL'ICUM, Alcoholic Extract of Aconite, (Aconit. in pulv. crass. ℞j; Alcohol. dilut. Oiv. Moisten the aconite with half a pint of diluted alcohol: let it stand for 24 hours: transfer it to a displacement apparatus, and gradually add the remainder of the diluted alcohol. When the last portion of this has penetrated the aconite, pour in from time to time water sufficient to keep the powder covered. Stop the filtration when the liquid which passes begins to produce a precipitate, as it falls, in that which has already passed. Distill off the alcohol, and evaporate to a proper consistence. (Ph. U. S.)

EXTRACTUM ALOES PURIFICA'TUM, Purified extract of aloes. (The gummy part extracted by boiling water, defecated and inspissated.) Dose, gr. v. to gr. xv.

EXTRACTUM CASCARILLÆ RESINO'SUM, Resinous extract of cascarrilla, (Cort. cascarrilla in pulv. crass. ℞j, Sp. vini rect. ℞iv. Digest for four days; then decant and strain; boil the residuum in ten pints of water to two; filter and evaporate the decoction, and distil the tincture in a retort, till both are thickened; then mix and evaporate to a pilular consistence.) Dose, gr. x to gr. xx in pills.

FACE, Facies, Vultus, Voltus, Proso'pon, (F.) Facs. The face is the anterior part of the head. It is formed of 13 bones, viz. the two superior maxillary, the two malar, the two ossa nasi, the two ossa unguis, the vomer, the two ossa spongiosa inferiora, the two palata bones, and the inferior maxillary, without including the frontal portion of the os frontis, and the 32 teeth, which may be considered to form part of it. Its numerous muscles are chiefly destined for the organs of sight, hearing, taste, and smell. Its arteries proceed from the external carotid: its veins end in the jugular, and its nerves draw their origin immediately from the brain.

The face experiences alterations in disease, which it is important to attend to. It is yellow in jaundice, pale and puffy in dropsy; and its expression is very different according to the seat of irritation, so that, in infants, by an attention to medical physiognomy, we can often detect the seat of disease.

Hippocrates has well depicted the change which it experiences in one exhausted by long sickness, by great evacuations, excessive hunger, watchfulness, &c., threatening dissolution. Hence this state has been called Facies Hippocraticæ, Facies Cadavericæ, F. Tortuallis. In this, the nose is pinched; the eyes are sunk; the temples hollow; the ears cold, and retracted; the skin of the forehead tense, and dry; the complexion livid; the lips pendent, relaxed, and cold, &c.

The term Face, (F.) is likewise given to one of the aspects of an organ; thus, we say, the superior face of the stomach.

FACE, INJECTÉE, see Vultus—f. Vultus, see Vultus.

FACETTE, (F.) Diminutive of fac. A small face: a small, circumscribed portion of the surface of a bone, as the articular facets of a bone.

FACIAL ARTERY, La'bial artery, Angular or external maxillary artery, A. palato-labial—(Ch); is a branch of the external carotid, which rises beneath the digastricus, and is distributed to almost every part of the face. It furnishes the inferior palatal, submental, superior labial, inferior labial, and dorsalis nasi.

FACIAL NERVE, Portio dura of the 7th pair, Ramus du'rrior septima conjugatio'nis, Sympatheticus minor, Respiratory nerve of the face, Par septimum sive faciale, Communicans faciei nervus. This nerve arises from the inferior and lateral part of the tuber annulare, in the groove which separates it from the medulla oblongata, external to the corpora olivaria, and by the side of the auditory nerve. It issues from the cranium by the meatus auditorius internus; enters the aqueduct of Fallopius; receives a branch of the Vidian nerve; sends off filaments to the internal muscles of the malleus and stapes; furnishes that called Chorda Tympani; makes its exit at the foramen stylo-mastoideum, and divides into two branches—the temporo-facial, and cervico-facial. On the face it is termed, Pes anserinus, Plexus nervorum anserinus.

FACIAL VEIN, Palato-labial—(Ch.), arises between the skin and frontalis muscle, and bears the name V. Frontalis; (F.) Veins frontales ou V. Préparates. It then descends, vertically, towards the greater angle of the eye, where it is called Angularis; and afterwards descends, obliquely, on the face, to open into the internal jugular, after having received branches, which correspond with those of the facial artery. It is only in the latter part of its course that it is called Facial Vein. Chaussier calls the external carotid artery, Facial Artery.

FACIENT, faciens, 'making,' from facio, 'I make.' A suffix, as in Calefacient, Rubefacient, &c., 'warm making,' 'red making.'

The East India Tacamahac, Balsamm Vir'idè, O'leum Mar'ie, Balsamm Cal'aba, Balsamm mar'ie, Baume vert, is yielded by the Calophyllum inophyllum.

The name Tacamahac is also given to a resin furnished by Populus balsamifera, which grows in the northern parts of America and Siberia.

ACIDUM MURIATICUM.	Sulphuric Acid.	Deposites by evaporation the salts it may contain; precipitates with solution of hydrochlorate of baryta if it contains sulphuric acid.
— NITRICUM.	Muriatic and Sulphuric Acid.	The presence of chlorine is indicated by a precipitate with nitrate of silver: that of sulphuric acid by the same result with hydrochlorate of baryta.
— SULPHURICUM.	Muriatic and Nitric Acids.	The presence of muriatic and nitric acid is indicated by the smell, when the acid tested is strongly heated.
— CITRICUM.	Tartaric and Oxalic Acids.	Their presence is indicated by forming a granular sediment in a concentrated solution of a neutral salt of potassa.
ÆTHER RECTIFICATUS.	Too dilute. Sulphuric Acid ..... Alcohol .....	Its S. G. detects this. By acetate of barytes. Precipitate white. With phosphorus a milky instead of limpid solution is formed.
AQUA AMMONIÆ.	Carbonic Acid.	A precipitation occurs on adding a solution of muriate of lime.
AMMONIÆ CARBONAS.	.....	It should be capable of complete volatilization by heat.
AMMONIACUM.....	.....	The Gutta Ammoniaca are white, clear, and dry.
ANTIMONI SULPHURETUM.	..... Lead. Arsenic ..... Manganese and Iron. Copper .....	The lump Ammoniaca , lapis Ammoniaca , is often adulterated with common resin. It ought to be entirely volatilized by a red heat. Imparts a foliated texture, and is not vaporizable. A smell of garlic is emitted when thrown on live coals, &c. Are not vaporizable.
ARGENTI NITRAS.	Nitrate of Potassa.	The solution assumes a blue colour, when super-saturated with ammonia. It may be suspected when the salt deliquesces.
ARSENICUM ALBUM.	Chalk, Sulphate of Lime, Sulphate of Barytes.	The adulteration with nitrate of potassa is easily recognized by the fracture of a stick of it which is radiated when pure, and granular if adulterated; or by precipitating a solution of the salts with a sufficient quantity of muriatic acid, and evaporating the clear liquor: the nitrate of potassa or other salts will remain.
BALSAMUM PERUVIANUM.	A mixture of Resin and some Volatile Oil, with Benzoin.	Not volatilizable by heat. Not easily detected.

MEDICINES.	ADULTERATIONS.	MODE OF DETECTION.
CALUMBA.	.....	The true is distinguishable from the false Calumba by adding to an infusion of the root, a few drops of solution of sulph. iron, which gives to the infusion of the false Calumba, a greenish black colour; but produces no change in the other.
CAPSICUM. Cayenne Pepper.	Chloride of Sodium, Red Lead.	This disposes it to deliquesce. Digest in acetic acid, and add a solution of sulphuret of ammonia—a dark-coloured precipitate will be produced.
CASTOREUM. Castor.	A mixture of dried blood, gum ammoniac, and a little real castor, stuffed into the scrotum of a goat.	Smell and taste will generally detect the fraud.
CERA FLAVA. Yellow Wax.	Earth or Pearmeal....	May be suspected when the cake is brittle and colour grayish.
	Resin.....	Put it in cold alcohol, which will dissolve the resin, without acting on the wax.
	Tallow.....	Is known by the greater softness and unctuousity, and its smell when melted. Turmeric is generally added in this case to obviate the paleness.
CERA ALBA. White Wax.	White Lead.....	Melt the wax, the oxide will subside.
CINCHONA. Bark.	Tallow.....	The cake has not its ordinary transparency.
COCCUS. Cochineal.	This is variously adulterated.	Can only be detected by practice, and examining into the quantity of quinia or cinchona it contains.
	Pieces of dough formed in moulds, and col- oured with cochineal.	Throw it into water, the adulteration will appear.
COPAIBA. Balsam of Copaiva.	Oil.....	If it does not retain its spherical form when dropped into water, its adulteration may be inferred. Mix one part of strong liquid ammonia of 22°c, with three parts of copaiba. If pure, the mixture will, in a few minutes, become transparent; if not, it will remain opaque.
CROCUS. Saffron.	Fibres of smoked Beef..	Affords an unpleasant odour when thrown on live coals.
CUBBA. Cubeb.	Petals of the Calendula officinalis , and Carthamus Tinctorius .	Infuse the specimen in hot water, and the difference will be perceptible.
CUSPARIA CORTEL. Angustura Bark.	Turkey Yellow Berries, or the dried fruit of the Rhamnus Catharticus .	Detected by attentive examination.
GUALACI RESINA. Resin of Guaiacum.	False Angustura some- times sold for it.	The epidermis of the true Cusparia is characterized by being covered with a matter resembling the crust of iron.
	Common Resin.....	Detected by the turpentine smell emitted when thrown upon hot coals.
	Manchineel Gum.....	Add to the tincture a few drops of spirit of nitre, and dilute with water: the guaiacum is precipitated—the adulteration floats in the white strata.
HYDRARGYRI NITRI- CO-OXYDUM. Red Precipitate.	Red Lead.....	Digest in acetic acid: add sulphuret of ammonia, which will produce a dark coloured precipitate. It should be totally volatilized by heat.
		A precipitation will be produced by the carbonate of potash, from a solution made by boiling the suspected sample with a small portion of muriate of ammonia in distilled water; or, the presence of deutochloride of mercury is indicated, by warming gently a small quantity of calomel in alcohol, filtering and adding to the clear liquor some lime-water, by which a reddish yellow precipitate is afforded. When calomel is rubbed with a fixed alkali, it ought to become intensely black, and not exhibit any orange hue.
HYDRARGYRI SUB- MURIAS. Calomel.	Corrosive Sublimate....
HYDRARGYRI SUL- PHURETUM BRUM.	Red Lead.....	Digest in acetic acid, and add sulphuret of ammonia—a black precipitate will be produced.
HYDRARGYRI SUL- PHURETUM GRUM.	Ivory Black.....	Throw a suspected portion on hot coals—the residuum will detect the fraud.

MEDICINE.	ADULTERATIONS.	MODE OF DETECTION.
IODINE.	.....	The tests of its purity are—that it is perfectly soluble in ether—Heated on a piece of glass or porcelain, it sublimes without residuum.
JALAPÆ RADIX. Jalap Root.	Bryony Root .....	Bryony root is of a paler colour, and less compact texture, and does not easily burn at the flame of a candle.

MAGNESIÆ SUBCARBONATÆ. Carbonate of Magnesia.	Chalk .....	Detected by adding dilute sulphuric acid to the suspected substance, when, if chalk be present, there will be a white insoluble precipitate.
	Gypsum .....	Boil in distilled water, and test the solution by a barytic and oxalic reagent.
MANNA.	.....	A fictitious article, consisting of honey or sugar mixed with scammony, is sometimes sold for it; but the colour, weight, transparency, and taste detect it.
MORPHIÆ ET EJUS SALÆ. Morphine and its Salts.	.....	Morphia and its salts, when placed in contact with nitric acid, are coloured red; with per-salts of iron, blue. They are perfectly soluble in warm alcohol, and acidulated warm water. When morphia is mixed with narcotina, the adulteration is ascertained by mixing them with sulphuric ether, which dissolves the narcotina, without sensibly affecting the morphia.
	.....	The bag must not appear to have been opened.
MOSCHUS. Musk.	Dried Blood .....	This may be suspected, if it emits a fetid smoke when inflamed.
	Asphaltum .....	Discovered by its melting and running, before it inflames.
	Fine particles of Lead.	Rub with water. The metallic particles will subside.
	Fixed Oils .....	Touch writing paper with it, and hold it before the fire: fixed oil leaves a stain of grease.

It is bad when soft and friable, when intensely black or mixed with many impurities, and when sweet. The quantity of morphia affords the best test.
OPIMUM.	.....
POTASSI IODIDUM. Iodide of Potassium. Potassæ Hydriodas. Hydriodate of Potassa.	Chloride of Potassium.	The adulteration is ascertained by precipitating a solution of the salt with nitrate of silver, and treating the precipitate with ammonia, which dissolves the chloride of silver, without acting upon the iodide of this metal.
QUINIÆ SULPHAS. Sulphate of Quinia.	.....	Leaves no residue when submitted to calcination: is perfectly soluble in warm alcohol, and in water slightly acidulated with sulphuric acid.
STRYCHNINÆ ET EJUS SALÆ. Strychnia and its Salts.	Bruca .....	They are free from brucia when no colour is produced by contact with nitric acid.

FASCIA ILIACA, Iliac aponeurosis. An aponeurosis, which proceeds from the tendon of the psoas minor, or which arises from the anterior surface of the psoas magnus, when the former muscle does not exist. It is attached, externally, to the inner edge of the crest of the ilium, below, and anteriorly—on one side, to the crural arch, sending an expansion to the fascia transversalis; and on the other, continuous with the deep-seated lamina of the fascia lata, which forms the posterior paries of the crural canal. Within and behind, the fascia iliaca is attached to the brim of the pelvis, and is continuous with the aponeurosis, which M. Jules Cloquet has called Pelvicæ. The iliac aponeurosis covers the iliac and psoas muscles, which it separates from the peritoneum.

FASCIA INGUINALIS, Spica.

FASCIA LATA. A name given by anatomists to an aponeurosis, and to a muscle.

FASCIA LATA APONEUROSIS, Fascia aponeurotica femoris, Vagina femoris, Crural or Femoral Aponeurosis, is the most extensive in the body, and envelops all the muscles of the thigh. Above, it is attached to the outer edge of the ilia; below, it arises from the crural arch by two distinct laminae, separated by the femoral vessels, and becoming confounded a little below the part where the great vena saphæna opens into the crural vein. Of these two laminae, the one is more anterior and thicker than the other, and may be considered as a prolongation of the aponeurosis of the external oblique. It is intimately united to Poupart's ligament. The other; which is thinner, is behind, and deeper seated; and, after its union with the former, proceeds to be inserted into the pubis. Inferiorly, the fascia lata becomes confounded with the tendon of the triceps, and is attached to the external tuberosity of the tibia. The use of the fascia lata, like that of other aponeuroses, is to strengthen the action of the muscles, &c.

FASCIA, OBTURATOR, see Pelvic aponeuroses—f. Pelvic, Internal, see Pelvic aponeuroses—f. Pelvic, Lateral, see Pelvic aponeuroses—f. Pelvic, Superior, see Pelvic aponeuroses.

FASCIA PROPRIA. A layer of cellular tissue derived from the sheath of the femoral vessels,—or according to some from the cribriform fascia. It is one of the coverings of femoral hernia, and is generally pretty dense about the neck of the hernia; but thin or even wanting on its fundus.

FASCIA SUPERFICIALIS, Superficial aponeurosis of the abdomen and thigh, (F.) Aponeurose superficielle de l'abdomen et de la cuisse. A very thin aponeurosis, which covers the muscles and aponeuroses of the abdomen; passes before the crural arch, to which it adheres with some degree of force; sends a membranous sheath, which surrounds the spermatic chord; and is continuous with the dartos, which it assists in forming. The fascia superficialis presents, beneath the crural arch, very distinct fibres whose direction is parallel to the fold of the thigh. It is applied over the fascia lata aponeurosis, and is attached, internally, to the ascending ramus of the ischium, near the root of the corpus cavernosum. Before the descent of the testicle from the abdomen, the fascia superficialis is very manifestly continuous with the Gubernaculum testis.

FASCIA TIFORMIS, T. bandage—f. Tortilis, Tourniquet.

FASCIA TRANSVERSALIS, F. Cooperi. An aponeurosis, which separates the transversalis muscle from the peritoneum in the inguinal region. It arises above the posterior edge of the crural arch, where it seems to be continuous with the aponeurosis of the greater oblique muscle. Above, it is lost in the cellular tissue at the internal surface of the transversalis abdominis. Within, it is continuous with the outer edge of the tendon of the rectus muscle and Gimbernat's ligament; below, it is continuous with the aponeurosis of the greater oblique, and receives an expansion from the Fascia Iliaca. Towards its middle and a little above the crural arch, the fascia transversalis has the wide orifice of a canal, which is occupied, in the female, by the round ligament of the uterus; and in man, furnishes an expansion, that serves as a sheath to the spermatic vessels.

In Pharmacy, it means manipulus, Chiroplectes, χειροπληκτη, 'a handful;'—Musa Brassavola, says,—as much as can be held in two fingers.

FAT, *Pingudō, Pingustūdo, Pim'ōl, Piar, Piai'ron, Lipos, Stear, Adops, Sevum, Sebum, Corpus adiposum, Azun'gia, Fat, (F.) Graisse: from (G. and A. S.) Fett. A soft, white, animal substance; inodorous; insipid; oily; inflammable, easy to melt; spoiling in the air, and becoming rancid by union with oxygen: almost insoluble in alcohol; insoluble in water; soluble in fixed oils. Fat is formed of the immediate principles, stearin, margaric and olein, all of which are regarded as salts composed of stearic, margaric and oleic acids and a common base to which, from its sweetish taste, the name Glyc'eris has been given. To these are, almost always, joined an odorous and a colouring principle. Glycerin has been used in the form of lotion composed of half an ounce to ten fluid-ounces of water in cutaneous diseases, as psoriasis, pityriasis, lepra and ichthyosis. It forms a kind of varnish, and might be useful in cases of burns.

Fat is found in a number of animal tissues, and is very abundant in the neighbourhood of the kidneys and in the epiploon. It is generally fluid in the cetacea; soft, and of a strong smell in the carnivora; solid, and inodorous in the ruminating animal; white, and abundant in young animals; and yellowish in old. It generally forms about a 20th part of the weight of the human body. The fat, considered physiologically, has, for its function, to protect the organs; maintain their temperature; and to serve for nutrition in case of need; as is observed in torpid animals.

FAT, Corpulent—f. Cells, Fatty vesicles—f. Mackaw, see Cocos butyrea.

FATIGATIO, Copos.

FATTY, *Adiposus, Adipatus, Pimeli'ous, Pimelo'des, Sax. Fæt; past participle of Fevan, to feed,—ad'ipos. Relating to fat. Resembling fat. The cellular system has been called fatty or adipous; from an opinion that, in its areolæ the fat is deposited. The cellular membrane, however, merely lodges, between its lamellæ and filaments, the vesicles in which the fat is contained.

FATTY LIGAMENT, *Adipous ligament. This name has been given to a reflection of the synovial membrane of the knee joint, which passes from the ligamentum patellæ towards the cavity that separates the condyles of the femur.

FATTY MEMBRANE, *Adipous membrana, Adipous tissue. The subcutaneous cellular tissue, or that containing the fatty or adipous vesicles.

FATTY VESICLES, *Adipous vesiculae, Sac'culi adiposi, Fat cells. This name is given to small burse or membranous vesicles which enclose the fat, and are found situate in the areolæ of the cellular tissue. These vesicles vary much in size. Generally, they are round and globular; and in certain subjects, receive vessels which are very apparent. They form so many small sacs without apertures, in the interior of which are filaments arranged like septa. In fatty subjects, the adipous vesicles are very perceptible, being attached to the cellular tissue and neighbouring parts by a vascular pedicle. Raspail affirms that there is the most striking analogy between the nature of the adipous granules and that of the amylaceous grains.

FATTY VESSELS, *Adipous vessels. The vessels connected with the fat. Some anatomists have called Adipous canals, (F.) Conduits adiposæ, the vessels to which they attribute the secretion of fat.

FAUNORUM LUDIBRIA. *The sports of the Fauns. Some authors have called thus the incubus; others, epilepsy.

FAUSSE COUCHE (F.), *Vanum parturium. Some authors have used this term for the expulsion of different bodies constituting false conceptions; such as moles, hydatids, clots of blood, &c. Most accoucheurs use the term synonymously with abortion.

FAUSSE POSITION (F.), *False position. The French use this term, in vulgar language, to indicate the torpor, and tingling, and loss of power over the motion of a part, produced by too strong contraction or painful compression.

FAUSSE ROUTE, False passage.

FAUSTINI PASTILLI, *Faustinus's Lozenges. These were once celebrated. They were composed of burnt paper, quicklime, oxide of arsenic, sandarach, lentils, &c.
